

rior clergyman, whether his Bishop be Whig or Tory. Is not the recent history of the English Church disgraced by innumerable acts of oppression? One strong argument against the existence of the Spiritual Peers, perhaps the strongest of all, was never alluded to in the discussion. Episcopacy had some pretensions to be the national religion, at least in England and Ireland, a century ago; but this distinct on it has utterly lost. The Bishops are now merely the representatives of a sect, and that sect embraces little more than one-third of the population of the empire. So far from being the guardians of the great interests of religion and morals, they are nothing else than the attorneys of a party, placed in Parliament to watch over its little interests, and to obstruct the progress of that just and sound state of things to which the country is surely though slowly advancing, which shall put all religious denominations on a level.

FROM THE SAME.

We observe that Government has taken advantage of the steamer in the Persian Gulf, to make a survey of some of the other rivers besides the Euphrates. Colonel Chesney sailed seventy miles up the Karoon, (the ancient Eulcus or river of Susa,) and found six feet of water. He afterwards made a voyage up the Tigris, and reached Bagdad 19th of September in five days from the Persian Gulf, a distance of probably five hundred miles, though they were retarded by want of fuel, and found the upper part of the stream much obstructed by shoals. It must be remembered, however, that the streams were then in their low state. It thus appears that the great rivers which fall into the gulf will open up extensive facilities for commercial intercourse with the interior of the country, when brought under the dominion of steam. The most difficult part of the Euphrates seems to be about two days' voyage above Bussora, where the river spreads out into broad marshes. "At Lunoon, (says the letter,) begin the marshes, which extend forty-eight miles, and are very intricate, the main channel becoming narrow, sometimes not more than thirty-five feet wide, with extremely sharp turnings every two hundred yards; our wheels got very much damaged, and the vessel heavily strained. We thought ourselves fortunate in getting through this part as well as we did. Immediately below the marshes we had our first and only brush with the Arabs, who were a bad set here, and managed very soon to quarrel with us, in hopes of plundering the vessel; it ended in a short engagement with them, when four of them were killed; no one was hurt in the steamer. From the marshes downwards the river is very broad and deep, so that we arrived at Bussora on the 10th of June, two days after our fight."
