Actions in equity have been begun to set aside all of Blethen's conveyances, with what result time, and probably a long time, will decide. Much local discussion has ensued on Mr. Blethen's action:—Was he morally justified in endorsing so much paper, and, before its maturity, selling all his estate and going to remote portions of the neighboring republic? Many urge that, having paid all his own liabilities, he had a right to do as he pleased with his property, and let those who took his name get what they can out of Dennis & Doane. One thing is certain, that the suddenness with which many parties found out that their relations to Dennis & Doane, as the holders of the bulk of their paper, were vastly changed, and not for the better, was very painful and surprising.

Commenting on these cases, one who has had experience of them says: "The fact is that, without an Insolvent Act, the bankrupt and his friends are masters of the situation. The bankrupt secures his friends, and makes the balance of his estate divisible among only such of his creditors as choose to accept its conditions within a given time. The condition invariably is that of a free discharge of the debt, or balance of it. Most creditors dare not refuse this condition, unless the estate is almost eaten up in preferentials, and the debtor winds up on his own terms. A few years more of experience of this mode of winding up insolvent estates will
