the whole series of shocks lasted about two years.

The country was sparsely settled, and no scientific records of the disturbance were made, but it is related that the aluvial land of the river bottoms was traversed by visible waves, which rocked the trees to and fro and uproted many. Huge fissures were opened, and lakes were drained by the escape of their waters into them. The largest sunken area is said to have been 60 or 80 miles long and nearly half as broad.

Coal Ranges Being Rapidly Displaced By More Modern and Convenient Apparatus.

THE ADVANTAGES ARE NUMEROUS.

Process of Evolution From the profitable place open for inspection than the store of the Gurney Oxford Stove and Furnace Company, 231 and 233 Yonge-street. David Millar, manager, and his assistants have left nothing undone in the arrangement of the stoves, heaters, refrigerators and other utensils of the culinary department to make the display highly attractive and interesting. Of course, conspicuous in the display are the gas ranges, thoroly up-to-date in every respect. They combine beauty and utility with cheapness. The stove is the outcome and the perfection of an evolution from the open hearth, the brazier, the roasting pit, the fire-place with its hob and bake oven, the wood stove and the coal range, to the gas range, which seems to be the ideal cooking apparatus of this age. A good gas range will do everything that is required of a coal range, and it will do it more quickly, more easily and more cheaply. It does away with the coal, ashes, dirt, bother and worry. It is a luxury, but, unlike most luxuries, it has a feature of economy that appeals to everyone who considers the great advantages derived from that mode of cooking. A gas range means economy, because it does away with the consumption of coal, saves espect. They combine beauty and that mode of cooking. A gas range means economy, because it does away with the consumption of coal, saves work, and prevents dust and annoyance, because of there being no ashes to get rid of. Besides, it does not burn gas to any great extent—it burns air. It burns a great deal more air than gas. Many people have got into the way of thinking that a gas stove must be expensive, because gas costs so much; but they are wrong. An ordinary gas jet burns gas about eight times faster than a gas stove burner. The latter mixes up a lot of air with a little gas, producing a blue flame, with a high degree of heat.

A stove that has become very popular upon its merits is the "Oxford Economy." The feature of this is the elevated oven and broller, which prevents stooping on the part of the person working around it, and reduces labor to a point where it becomes a pleasure to prepare a meal. The ovens are asbestos-lined, have polished removable griddles, and everything else about the stove is the product of the best of conceptions.

Then there is the Oxford instantaneous gas water heater, the neat and compact appearance of which is only surpassed by its usefulness and results as a heater. The advantage of it can best be described in the statement that it will heat enough water in fifteen minutes for a bath, at a cost of less than one cent.

The Gurney Oxford Retrigerator is so constructed that its parts are all easily removed and can therefore be readily and perfectly cleaned, a thing most essential in housekeeping. The interior is constructed with metal and soldered, so that moisture cannot enter into the wood construction, and interior is constructed with metal and soldered, so that moisture cannot enter into the wood construction, and the ventilation is so perfect that the preservation of food is an assured fact.

All the stoves and other utensils are manufactured by the Gurney Foundry Company of this city, who are continually receiving unsolicited encomiums on the excellence of the articles from people who are using them.
