The Pacific Railway Telegraph Line contract is one of the mysteries that are worth watching. A few tenders are in among them one from Mr. Drummond, formerly manager of the Dominion Telegraph Company's line. He has fyled a careat for an invention of a new system of telegraph poles, which he intends to adopt on the Pacific line, if he gets the contract. It consists of three small poles put in the shape of a tripod, ingeniously fastened at the bottom into line, spikes with sockets. He calculates that he can with 10 men build a mile of telegraphic line per day, by his system, and use any kind of timber, as, by his plan, the poles will not rot so rapidly as when they are planted in the earth.

We notice that when a gentleman out there, engaging in single combat and getting more lead than he can digest, leaves the gentle vale, as Major Duffield did the other day, the editors do their best in manufacturing a tender obituary. It's hard work sometimes. Thus, upon the demise of Duffield, The Arizona Miner is obliged to say: "His reputation in the community was not such as a quiet, orderly citizen should bear, and many that knew him will say that he lived as he died." This was certainly rough on the deceased Duffield; and naturally enough before finishing, The Arizona Miner relents, and amiably adds: "Nevertheless, Major Duffield had many good streaks in his singular composition, and his friends everywhere will feel sad over his untimely fate." "Mary good streaks" is good, and "friends everywhere" implies a large circle of good streaks" is good, and "friends everywhere" implies a large circle of lovers and admirers. The Major was probably passionate, domineering, and brutal, aiways ready for a quarrel, never loth to kill when the quarrel came; but then he had many "good streaks of character," and that is about all that our best friends will be able to say of the best of us, when we have been decently or otherwise "urned," Why is it, asks Appleton's Journal, that publication of articles in the Pays, calculated to disturb the public peace and to stir up hatred and contempt among citizens. M. de Cassagnac defended himself. M. Lachaud was counsel for the printer and publisher of the paper. M. de Cassagnac maintained that the Bonapartists were a great party, having as good a right as others to the protection of the law. He did not know the political opinions of the jury. If they were Republicans, he relied on the sentiment of equity for an acquittal. If they were Conservatives, they would acquit him as one of their own party. The verdict was not guilty, a result which is looked upon by the Bonapartists as a great triumph.
