frequently called upon to chronicle fatal mischances resulting from a want of ordinary presautice, if not from positive rashness. The little child, who, left alone in the house, "for a few moments," drinks boiling water of sets itself in flames by playing with lucifer matches, is of too frequent mention in the newspapers to need special citation. While was a camparison example, we have nearly as often the other stereotyped juvenile from "two" "four" years olds, who, while playing about under no supervision tumbles into a well or water butt, from which he is taken out lifeless an hour or two bies into a well or water butt, from which he is taken out lifeless an hour or two afterwards, when he has come to be missed. Two cases of this kind—one with a fatal termination—have been chronicled in the papers this week. As for the established gun "catastrophe" one has reported, or read too frequently, not to know all about it. Somebody has been out shooting, and brought in a gun. It would not, of sourse, take more than pleasure in saying that we have found it

"Two young men hire a horse and buggy "at a livery stable and go into the coun" try on Sunday. They stop at the first "tavern, and invest in some ordent spirits. They stop again pretty soon, and hoist in some more ardent spirits. The more they hoist in, the more they wire, till, by-and-bye, a bridge tips "them over into a gutter which some body has left by the side of the oad, "and they are killed, including the horse and buggy. Verdict an unavoidable catastrophe."

There are a few simple precautious, the rigid observance of which would do away with three-fourths of the long record of accidents to children which every every year now brings forth. As regards loaded guns, if kept in the house, they should be under lock and key, or on a rack near the ceiling A good additional precaution is to have a card with the word "loaded" printed or legibly written on it, fixed up close to the gun On no account should a loaded gun be left for a single instant in a room corner—as the owner, however soon he may intend to use it sgain. or however watchful he may propose to humself to be while it remains, may have his recollection or attention unexpectedly diverted by some sudden incident—a domestic accident, in fact—or the unlooked for the best stock ever shown in this town. call of a friend. in a house without the name being distinetly marked upon-it. All poisons, besides being properly labelled as such, should be rigorously under lock and key. An uncovered candle should never e permitted in a cellar or outhous where straw or shavings are placed; nor should the dangerous practice of reading in bed with a candle on the pillow or by the bedside be indulged in, unless there is a second person to watch that no mischief ensues.—Mail.

This new mattress, a trial of which we noticed two or three days ago, was yesterday subjected to a crucial test out of which it came triumphant. Both the bees used on the previous corasion, the one filled wholly with sork, the other with prepared cork and hair, were allowed to remain in the water for twenty seven hours with a mass of iron, equivalent to eweight of three men, fastened on to of them. At one o'clock yesterday afternoon, they not only floated as buoyantly as when first thrown in, but each supported the additional weight of a sailor, from the "Circassian," aho was able to sit upon each without the mattresses sinking. This was proof conclusive of the value of the invention, and the many persons who witnessed the trial expressed to the invention, and the many persons who witnessed the trial expressed to the inventor Mr. Goo.

one has reported, or read too frequently, not to know all about it. Somebody has been out shooting, and brought in a gun. It would not, of course, take more than an additional minute to stow it away on its usual rack, or in any safe place. But instead, it is clapped into a corner of the kitchen or sitting room. Enter next two boys, who see a gun, and no person. They begin to play with it. One putson a cap, and is delighed with the mimic explosion. Then the other puts on a cap, and "masking sure that the gun cannot be loaded" he points it at his companion, who in a moment, is lying lifetes on the ground under the effects of a full charge of shot. As familiar as this is the accidental poisoning catastrophe. John Rorison has a bottle of poison which he puts on a shelf in a cupboard in a corner, you know, "out of the way of all harm"—but without any label of distinctive mark. John Rorison's child has the stomach ache in the night. The nurse going to the cupboard intending to get some syrup of rhubsrb, mistakes the laudanum bottle, and give a teaspoonful of it to the child, which is speedily a corpse. These "fatal accidents," as they are called, put one in mind of the genius of "visitations of Providence" humorously illustrated by Josh Billings. "Two young men hire a horse and buggy "at a livery stable and go into the coun" try on Sunday. They stop at the first
