YPRES TODAY IS NOT YPRES OF 1915

Canadian Construction Units Today Aid In British Drive There

War Correspondents' Headquarters, France Aug. 1.—(By Mail)—While splendid regiments from the Mother Country—English, Scottish and Welsh—and Anzacs are fighting their victorious way around where Canada first won her spurs, the Dominion corps under Lieut. General Currie, are holding the line on another part of the western front. But there is another happy, unlisted corps of Canadians that is helping the thrust back from the Ypres salient, and to the north and south.

It is over a year since the call came from the British high command for specialists and more than from any other part of the empire has been answered by the Dominion. When Lieut. General Turner, as Canadian commander in England, turned his attention to the formation of these expert battalions which are so necessary to the modern commander as are the ordinary infantry and artillery he made no mistake in his choice, even taking good fighting officers, who had won fame at railway construction from their units in the front line. There was grumbling at first but now there are no grumblers but "happy-to-be-in-it" officers and men. One of the converted battalions still wear their home rank badges, but they are now to be Canadian Railway Construction Corps.

Yesterday I wandered along the fringe of the greatest battle the world has ever seen. Canadian may, for a time proudly call it the Third Battle of Ypres. Where once there had been a Canadian battalion's headquarters, there was a neatly-built, shell-proof series of dugouts, with a British brigadier and his staff busily at work. The walls were packed with stained wood and brown sacking to match. There were even places for ordnance maps where the new tenants had not even been. A self-contained electric plant lighted the offices and the tunnels which the whole battalion could shelter in comfort. Electric fans kept the atmosphere pure. Canadian tunnelling companies, the same men who had been under the Huns at Messines, built them and even the Huns would admit they are quite the latest fashion in dugouts. Outside the entrance to the dugouts, there was a front of him, a Vancouver captain was discussing a similar set, somewhere about the place where Canada made her grand stand at St. Julien. He had been out in the newly captured trenches that morning, a few hours after our wave had gone forward. He had found, still marked, some of the Canadian graves their comrades left when they retreated that April afternoon.

For a Canadian railway battalions have been building strategic lines of all gauges up to our former trenches. At first Fritz used to be shell-proof, but this year these expert track-layers have won their own victory. The Huns have discovered that it is cheaper to shell a line with shells, but this network than for them to shell and destroy it. Night and day, in sunshine and rain, though these Canadian battalions and their British sides of the labor battalions were under fire and casualties were not few. Three days ago one battalion was shelled out of its headquarters but they completed the spurs which were needed for the big guns on the morning of the attack.

At the syndromes behind the center of the advance, I found a French-Canadian pilot who had brought down three enemy planes on the first day of the battle. There were twelve Canadian men in his squadron, and up and down the line there are Canadian flyers in practically every escadrille.

There is a new siding run off the main railway line built of rails taken from the Transcontinental—there are Canadian casualty clearing stations, where nurses and doctors from Montreal and Toronto are busily attending wounded Englishmen and Highlanders brought down comfortably on light railways which were laid by Dominion troops. I remember the station nearby when bloody, half-gassed Canadians were sitting with only their field dressings staunching their wounds, waiting for a chance of a lift in an ambulance, heavy shell rumpling in the last hope of relief by train and crashing into the very buildings which gave them shelter. The saving credit side of war has improved. If the Huns had disabled the track yesterday, it would not have stopped the work of mercy. There is an alternative route to and from the hospitals. That is the system we work on now; very British in thoroughness, nothing to chide. Never once in yesterday's rush did the clearing station get filled to confusion.

Out on the canal across which our Dominion troops bridged over a shell-swept ponton bridge there are more Canadian men helping the ever-busy Royal Engineers throw across new wooden structures that will bear the heaviest artillery and rolling stores. The timbermen who have been working in the woods, and the Canadian mill right under the nose of the enemy, where Amherst rollers drive saws which came from Hamilton and the sawyer and his men still wear the Stetsons of the woods, and live on bacon and beans—sometimes. British rations are, they say, too luxurious even for bushmen.

Everyone out here knows that Canada is in this great last battle heart and soul, but in the victorious excitement of a great attack, one is liable to forget these men from overseas who have been plodding away under fire for months to make success doubly sure. They are content and appreciate to the full the praise their imperial comrades have not been slow to give them, and that they receive officially. There are as many honors to be won by them as by their fighting comrades around Lens and they are winning them.
