Striking Likenesses.

Striking Likenesses.

There are some curious coincidences in the strong likeness which has been noticed to exist between celebrities belonging to different ages. For instance, in Charles MacFarlane's "Reminiscences of a Literary Life" he describes how, meeting Shelley in the Royal Bourbon Museum at Naples, he showed him a statue of Agrippina, the mother of Nero. "I told him," he says, "that the Bonaparte family considered this the very image of their mother. When Madame Mere was in Naples, her daughter, Queen Caroline, induced her to sit by the statue, and made a large party remark on the striking resemblance." A similar coincidence between two great men of the same age was the likeness between Motley, the historian of "The Rise of the Dutch Republic," and Byron. It was so marked as to be described by the poet's wife as "most wonderful." oet's wife as "most wonderful."

"Such good news from my dear cousin, Corpl. Smith, in India. He writes that he is now convalescent. "Mercy on us! What a boy he is for promotion, to be sure!"

"Hotel waiters are not at all like they used to be."
"No. Formerly you told a waiter what you wanted to eat. Now he tells you what you can have."
