Righted in Time

"Why should I not speak of it?" cried Barry. "I have been thinking of it all this time. Of course I can understand it. He is far superior to me. You can look up to him, not down, as you do to me. He is a man after your own heart. He has all the glamour that his work for the poor can give him. His self-denial, his nobility. It is just the sort of thing that would appeal to you, I know. While I am an ordinary kind of fellow. With nothing in me worth the loving."

"Do you know what you are saying?" broke in Una. She only spoke in a shaking whisper. Her face was white. "Yes," he cried quickly. "I'd forgotten for a moment, it's true. But Spanking Doesn't Cure! It may as well come now. It would have come anyway some day. I've begun. "I guessed somehow, "I was would be here. And I wanted to say good-bye, since we shall never perhaps see each other again." Never again! Then there would never be another chance of explanation. This was the last, her only chance. She thought darted through Moya's mind, but close on it went another. "I can't explain," went that thought. "It's impossible. It's best that there should be no more chance. That he should go right away—and never know."

"We can say good-bye—as friends," went on Guy, quietly. "We have been friends. And we will forget everything else. I felt I could not go away without saying that—without feeling we were friends again, even if we do meet no more." Moya stared down at the smooth sand. She was wrestling with two impulses, and each seemed as strong as the other. The struggle was such pain that she could not speak. "Tell him," urged one impulse. And the other protested fearfully: "I cannot." Suddenly Guy's quiet voice deepened and quivered. "I wish I could wipe yesterday afternoon out of your memory," he said, passionately. "I was false to myself in those few moments—false to honor, and false to my love for you. That is why I would have you forget. I would I could only forget it myself!" Then Moya looked up. She heard the struggle in his voice, and she saw it now on his face. The keen regret of an honorable nature. And as Moya saw those lines of pain, suddenly all her thoughts changed. She lost sight of herself—how selfish she had been, thinking only of her self-respect, her own sense of humiliation! And now he was going away with this burden so galling to one of his sensitive nature—that he had acted dishonorably in telling her of his love. All through the future that memory would haunt him. And she, for the sake of her own wretched pride, "could let him go away with that burden."

Cord or Fabric. APPEARANCE is often deceptive—and no one can tell how much service a tire will give by looking at it. In buying tires you must rely almost entirely on the integrity of the manufacturer who produces them. You can depend absolutely on Partridge Tires because the factory is back of every tire they make.

conviction. "Now Moya is so bright, so lovable. There's beauty in her to love." Barry tucked his arm in hers with an air of proprietorship, and agreed quite gravely that there was nothing at all in her to love.

The boys and Una had been out for an early morning bath, and Barry had met them coming back. The boys were ahead now and out of sight, but these two had engrossing enough subjects for conversation that necessitated a strolling pace and an unhurried progress. And they talked on, discoursing on those subjects which are so very uninteresting to outsiders and so enthralling to the two who make one complete little world to themselves. "Why, here comes Moya," said Barry. He tucked his arm more firmly in Una's. "Now or never for it!" he decreed, blithely. "We may as well tell her now."

He laughed as they came level with Moya. "I've taken matters into my own hands, you see, Moya. Not very chivalrous of me, I'm ready to own. It's generally considered the lady's province to break off an engagement, isn't it? At least, it looks better that way. However, you have your remedy. You can prosecute me for breach of promise! You look surprised. Well, I simply couldn't stand it any longer. And that's just all about it!"

Not a very comprehensive statement, perhaps. But Moya, looking from Barry to Una, seeing the linked arms, the happy faces, understood easily enough "just all about it."

you were going to say you were sorry," he said. "But it's no good crying over spilt milk. It's been and gone and done, you see. After all, someone had to do it—to take the plunge. I don't believe you would ever have had courage enough to take it yourself."

And that, perhaps, was Moya's thought at that moment. Barry had had courage to cut the Gordian knot. She was the coward. If she could have had his courage, his simple straightforwardness—

"So I did," he laughed. "But I lost my freedom when I became engaged to you. And so I made the best of a bad matter. You're not going bathing now, are you, Moya? Everyone is out of the water and gone home to breakfast."

"Oh, I had breakfast early," she returned. And did not add that she had slept very little, woke with a headache, and breakfasted little, too, in her wish to avoid Guy. She would be out, away from the house—not even say good-bye to him. It was so much the best.

"I'm going for a walk," she told

Barry, and nodded good-bye smilingly enough to the two.

But the smile faded as they parted. So Barry had had courage. He had done the right thing undoubtedly. And Moya was glad he had done it. She went on thoughtfully till she came to her favorite seat on the old, worn arm of the breakwater. The tide was ebbing. Little rivulets wound away to the waves, coursing down from rocky pools. The sand was gloriously smooth and white—a fair, unwritten page for the day to write on what it willed.

"I was wrong," she sighed. "Not only foolish, but wrong. I should have known I could not do a thing like that without influencing other lives. And there was Una, too, after all."

That also cut into her heart with reproach. Una! Looking back, she could understand what she had been blind to before. Una's pained grey eyes, her sweet, unselfish desire that Moya might be happy, her gentle hints that Barry was despatched, that they were missing the best life could bring about.

"I might have ruined Una's happiness as well as my own," thought Moya, fearfully. "And all with one foolish, thoughtless step."

Her eyes were on those footsteps in the sand. But all at once a little wave ran up, higher and more boldly than the other. It ebbed away, it is true, sinking back into the falling tide. But its crystal, shining ripples had swept over those footprints. As Moya watched that wave ebb and ebb, she looked—and lo! the footsteps were gone, as if they had never been. (To be continued.)

PROPER SAUCES. There is nothing that adds to the "just-right-ness" of a nice juicy roast than the proper sauce as, every good cook knows. And there are some sauces that seem to belong to one kind of meat and no other. Who would ever think of serving mint sauce, for example, with anything else but roast lamb? It could go with boiled mutton, but oh, how much better this dish is accompanied with caper sauce. To make this cream two tablespoonsful of flour with half a cupful of butter and add to it a pint of boiling water. Cook until thick, stirring constantly. Season well with salt and pepper; add a tablespoonful of lemon juice and three tablespoonfuls of capers, and serve.

The Shah Travels. The Shah of Persia is on his travels. London will see him and keep him, apparently, for some little time. Europe has memories of the peregrinations of other shahs. They are quaint memories, some of them. There was Nasr-ed-Din, in 1872, and there was Ahmed Mirza, many years later. There would have been a visit, in 1894, on the part of Nasr-ed-Din, but for a Brussels Journalist. It happened that, on the Shah's traveling programme becoming known, a Brussels daily published an article which seemed to prognosticate a cool welcome in Belgium. The Minister of Justice of the period thought fit to give the article the publicity of judicial proceedings. The writer was summoned before a Brabant tribunal, but he was exonerated. But the verdict had the immediate effect of keeping Nasr-ed-Din at home in Teheran.

recovered from the ashes. Possibly—and I cannot help leaning to this view—it was not worth the trouble of filling in all the forms to have fourteen ration books instead of seven.

The other day a quaint looking character jumbled in, coatless, hatless, not quite shirtless, but nearly boot-less. He thought he ought to have "one of them books as they take his paper out of." Naturally we asked him why he had not had one before? "Well"—and a mouth that smelt more of Eau-de-Burton than of Eau-de-Cologne approached my ear—"he'd pinched out of the asylum that morning, and didn't want to be copped again."

A few minutes in the waiting room was the treatment I prescribed for him while the police were communicated with.

A pathetic plea came from the father of sixteen, who also kept two lodgers—they do these things in the less exclusive neighborhoods. Could he have more sugar to make jam, and could he have it cheap? He thought he had done his duty to the country by helping to maintain the population, and he was also easing the housing problem.

Two very laudable pleas, but how do they affect food? Just as well ask the coal controller to give you a ton of coals because you have an allotment and keep pigs.

More sugar certainly is obtainable, but only on production of a doctor's certificate, which is also required for permission to exceed the butter ration.

Among the applications for the new ration cards from a small family came one for Bob Brown. A member of my staff who knew the family persisted that there was no Bob amongst them. So one of our secret-service agents was deputed to call on the head of the house. Bob was duly brought forth—a magnificent Newfoundland dog. Protestations were in vain. Pitiful tales did we hear that Bob was better than any son, and he did so enjoy a good bit of beer. Nothing doing. Women and children first in our line of business. Carry on without the dog, madam, and consider yourself lucky not to be in prison.

We haven't finished chucking yet over the puzzled parents who came in a week ago to ask if it was true—because the minister had told her so—that triplets counted as only one for ration books!

I should like to meet that varson. He would be a valuable acquisition to any staff.—London Ideas.
