CHAPTER XV. (Continued.)

"Let him grant it, if he dare," said De Bracy, he will soon see the difference betwixt the support of such a lusty lot of spears as mine and that of a heartless mob of Saxon churls. Yet I mean no immediate discovery of myself. Seem I not in this garb as bold a forester as ever blew horn? The blame of the violence shall rest with the outlaws of the Yorkshire forests. I have sure spies on the Saxon's motions. To-night they sleep in the convent of Saint Wittle, or Withold, or whatever they call that churl of a Saxon Saint at Burtonon-Trent. Next day's march brings them within our reach, and, falconways, we swoop on them at once. Presently after I will appear in mine own shape, play the courteous knight, rescue the unfortunate and es for their patronage during the past, fair one from the hands of the rude ravishers, conduct her to Front-de-Boeut's Castle, or to Normandy, if it should be necessary, and produce ment head and shoulders above its fel- her not again to her kindred until Through all these years of vacillating fortune the people of Fredericton and prices to suit the times. On Hand:—

"A marveilously sage plan," said Fitzurse, "and, as I think, not entirely of thine own device. Come be trank, De Bracy, who aided thee in the invention? and who is to assist in the execution; for, as I think thine own band lies as far off as York."

"Marry, if thou must needs which the adventure of the men of Benjamin suggested to me. He is to aid me in the ouslaught, and he and his followers will personate the outlaws, from whom my valorous arm is, after changing my garb, to rescue the lady." "By my halidome," said Fitzurse, "the plan was worthy of your unlimited wisdom! and thy prudence, De Bracy, 18 most especially manifested in the project of leaving a Complete Stock of Tinware, Japanned the lady in the hands of thy worthy Saxon friends, but how thou wilt rescue her afterward from the clutches of Bois-Guilbert seems considerably more doubtful. He

> "He is a Templar." said De Bracy, "and cannot therefore rival me in my plan of wed ing this heiress; and to attempt aught dishonorable against the intended bride of De Bracy-By Heaven, were he a whole Chapter of his Order in his single person, he dared not do me such an injury!"

I tell thee," answered De Bracy,
"that it will be the work of a few 1 yr hours, and I shall be at York at the head of my daring and valorous Old and Reliable Tailoring fellows, as ready to support any bold design as thy policy can be to form one. But I hear my comrades assembling, and the steeds

The meditations of the statesman were here interrupted by the voice of the Prince from an interior apartment, calling out; "Noble Waldemar Fitzurse!" and, with bonnet doffed, the tuture Chancellor (for to Norman aspire) hastened to receive the orders of the future sovereign.

CHAPTER XVI.

The reader cannot have forgotten that the event of the tournament was decided by the exertions of an unknown knight, whom, on account of the passive and indifferent on the former part of the day, the MADE OVER spectators had entitled, Le Noir Faineant. This knight had left the field abruptly when the victory was achieved, and when he was called upon to receive the reward of his valor, hewas now here to be found. In the meantime, while summoned by heralds and by trumpets, the knight was holding his course northward, avoiding all frequented paths, and taking the shortest road through the woodlands. He paused for the night at a small holstery, where he obtained news of the event of the tourney.
