'And yet,' said Philip, shaking his to him. head, 'you were so alarmed and up set that you came up here, Mrs. Tib-

Mrs. Tibbett coloured, and looked inything but amiable at Mr. Dyce. 'I'm a foolish woman,' she said, and easily frightened, besides,' and her eyes filled with tears, 'I've grown fond of Mr. Cyril-he's like a son to me, so gentle and kind as he is - and -Mrs. Tibbett broke down.

Leola left the window and laid he hand on the good creatures arm. 'Don't be alarmed, Mrs. Tibbett, she said, and her voice, though low rang clear and unfaltering. 'Mr. Kingsley has only gone up to London on business, and will be back to day, should have reached your ears, and I probably. You must have a glass of trust that we may find your generous and, with her own hands, poured ou some wine and brought it to her.

Mrs. Tibbett dried her eyes and drank the wine, and with a respectful courtesy moved to the door. Leola accompanied her.

Let me go up to your room, Miss Leola, dear, she said, in a whisper. Leola nodded, and closing the door Kingsley.' came back to the table.

Lady Vaux looked up through her eye-glasses.

'It is my opinion,' she said, slowly, that that good woman knows all

Leola looked up with a flash in her dyrk eyes. 'My dear 'Laura,' remonstrated

Philip, softly. 'I can't help it. I may be uncharitable, etc., etc.,' responded Lady Vaux, rising, 'but, tell me, if Mrs. Tibbett didn't suspect something was wrong, why did she come flying up

Leola opened her lips, but remain-'My dear child,' said Lady Vaux,

'Yes,' he said. 'it goes well, and you played your part very fairly, a little over-acted, perhaps.'

'It is enough to make anyone overact to see that girl's infatuation, Philip! As surely as we are walking along this road, she loves Cyril Philip Dyce frowned, and a flash shot from under his lowered lids.

'All the worse for him-and her,' he said. Lady Vaux laughed softly.

'It is an excellent comedy, and | -a traitor | Impossible! how well she stood it. The moment that woman mentioned the last train Leola changed colour; but she had Mrs. Wm. Miller, St. Catherines, Ont., her back to the window, and bore said, looking up suddenly, ' if anything
