Everything is at sixes and sevens. The text of the amendment to the address in the reply to the speech from the throne, referred to by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, and which was moved by Mr. Morley in behalf of the Opposition, is as follows: "It is our duty, however humbly to present to your majesty that our effective deliberation on fin-ancial services is impaired by con-flicting declarations from your majesty's ministers. We respectfully submit the judgment of this House that the removal of protective duties has, for more than half a century, actively conduced to the vast extension of trade and commerce of the realm and trade and commerce of the realm and the welfare of the population, and this House believes that while the needs fot social improvement are still mani-fold and urgent, and return to protective duties, and more particularly when imposed upon the food of the people, would be deeply injurious to the national strength, contentment and well being." The Government is not likely to be turned out on John Morley's amend ment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which is against any return to protective duties but the general impression prevails that the Government will not be able to keep its forces together to see the session to an end. In the House of Lords, Lord Fitz-william (Liberal Unionist), moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which was seconded by Lord Rylton (Conservative).

Earl Spencer, the Liberal leader in the House, followed. He said he hoped the Government's friendly offices had been offered to both powers, especially to Japan and asked for inespecially to Japan, and asked for information, from the Government re-garding Somaliland and Tibet, and the situation in South Africa, to which, he pointed out, no reference had been made in the speech from the throne. Earl Spencer added that he hoped an early decision in regard to the Goyernment's policy on the fiscal question would be reached, and announced that the Opposition would take every op-portunity of bringing the question before the country. Lord Lansdowne responded. He con-gratulated the House on the conclusion of the Anglo-French and Anglo-Italian arbitration treaties, deplored the situation in the near and Far East, and expressed the hope that a pacific solution of the differences in both cases would be reached.
