Conservative quarters insist, however, that "help shall be for the people, not for bolshevism." Some newspapers also declare that the Soviet Government "should stand aside, in view of its failure ti keep the commercial and economic system organized, and let the outside world assume direction of relief work with a free hand. Other organs recall that Germany hoped to live in peace and prosperity with Russia in an effort to heal "the war's economic wounds," and urge participation in Russian relief as an act of plain humanity, which, moreover, would serve to strengthen economic reported in recent advices from Fetrograd and Moscow.
