PART II.-THE WHIMS OF PLUTUS.

CHAPTER III. CHESTNUT HAIR.

In the lapse of years Cahill had grown at the tapse of years Canni had grown stout and redder than of old. He had passed the period since his visit to Killard with Mr. Hey wood in his former desultory manner. By this time people had unanimously come to the conclusion that his father must have found the that his father must have found the office of bailiff to Lord Clonmore more profitable than any one could have supposed, saved a large sum of money, and left his son to Christopher. If the popular estimate of the man had altered, it had altered for the better. He paid his way, offended no one, and if he had vices, who has not? and there were others as had as he in the town. He was friendly and cordial to all, and all were more or less friendly in manner to him, but few regarded him with cor-

Up to a certain point no one could be more communicative than he; beyond that point it was impossible tomake him utter another word. He spoke much and well of his neighbors, and rarely allowed their reputations to be assailed without raising a protest. He discussed general topics with freedom, and a species of dull common sense. But somehow he seemed to take only an assumed for the demand for any stake that thing but science. The idea was novel, interest in most of the people and affairs might be demanded, and that he had the and he could not make up his mind off around him, and rarely sought compower to lay. panionship or was leager to hear news or from the hearts of others.

On one subject alone by could be thoroughly roused into active interest. No mention, however slight, of either the Bishop's Island or the Lame's failed to stir him. At times when either was alluded to, his wandering eyes would, for a moment, fix themselves on the speaker; he would question without commenting or expressing an opinion of any kind. In the interval between Mr. Heywood's first visit to the village and his consent to go a second time, in com-pany with Cahill, no fact of any interest had come to light about David Lane. The solitary man dwelt on his island, holding less intercourse than ever with slight diminution of good feeling appear-ed to have arisen in the heart of the deaf to hold them in good esteem. mute towards Tom; and attrough the latter spoke of his friend in the old loyal. enthusi istic manner, David Larre appeared less anxious for the society of his companion.

The narrative did not differ in any material point from that of Mrs. Cantislion told to young Martin. There was some additional detail as to the manaer in which old Lane wrought upon the former Lord Channone to sell him the rock, but for all practical purposes, the two accounts were identical. He would have parted from half the savings of his father to learn the true history of Lane's desire to purchase the rock; he would have given all his money for the rock itself, and as far as active hope could enter into one of his sluggish nature, it possessed him to own the Bishop's Island, with right to all that was on it, under it, around it and above it. To attain this he would have faced almost anything, for, added to the dim notion of masses of shining metal, to his mind there hung a mysterious, occult air of superhuman power around the Island, and him who did or might possess it; and although outwardly he smiled at the idea of its owner having dealings with Darkness, inwardly he wordered how matters really stood between the Lanes and the Invisible.
