Finer Than Silk. Whenever a man is thoroughly contented with himself and is able to take all the real pleasure out of life that there may be in it, and wishes to impress people with the fact, he is apt to convey his impressions most effec-tively by an apt comparison. So, when a man who has for the best years of his life been an abject slave to the appe-tite for whisky writes to his friends that he feels "finer than silk," you may be certain that something wonderful and little short of miraculous has happened to that man.
