IR WILFRID LAURIER will do everything in his power to support the war policy of the Government. He gave this pledge to the people at the close of the campaign, and he will stand fast to his promises. The statements or hints that he will or should be invited to join the Government should not be taken too seriously, because there are men in the Government who went into it for the purpose of ending the power and influence of Laurier. It appears to The Adam and influence of Laurier there would be developed a broader civic spirit.

There should be a disposition among the new members of Union Government to give Quebec a fair chance. It is bad enough to read in Canadian cablegrams of inflamed political passions in Canada; it is doubly unfortunate when writers in the English press seek to add fuel to the flames from this side of the Atlantic. The Sunday Times publishes an article of a column and a half by Mr. Frederick Grundy which we are sure the editor would not have printed had he himself known more of the facts and realized how much mischief such heetic writing may do to stir up bitterness between the English and French-speaking peoples of Canada. It is not true to describe the representative French-Canadian as "strongly, even violently, anti-British," and to say that the Liberal party "dragged the flag of Canada in the mire both at the time of the Boer war and now" is to use language which might pass on a political platform in Canada, where it could at once be discounted by local knowledge and answered, but is quite out of place in the British press. Harry Lauder has been using Canadian platforms to deride French-Canadians as men of "bastard blood;" he would do well to get back as quickly as possible to the English music hall stage where he is so warmly appreciated. English and French have to live together in Canada, they together form the basis of Canadian nationhood, and the worst service any Canadian or Englishman can do Canada and the Empire is to hinder the appreciation by each of the good qualities of the other. Let us reserve our bombshells for the really

The main feature of the scheme is centralization, and it is designed to bring all spending under the con.
