OPENING CHAPTER—"THE SIGN OF THE TRIDENT"

It happened that a young rancher from San Mario, Phil Stanton by name, was just about leaving the Hotel Caledonia in search of adventure. It was his first visit to San Francisco in some months and he decided to make the most of it. As he reached the corner he heard a woman scream, then a motor car shot by him, almost knocking him from the curb. Phil came to his senses quickly and dashed across the square, hoping to cut off the distance between himself and the machine. After a short sprint he leaped for the running board and in another moment crashed through the glass of the door. One of the girl's assailants leaped from the car, but the other one bounded out from the impact of Stanton's fist. The chauffeur also leaped from the car, and Phil swung himself to the front seat, stopping it as it was about to climb the curb.

"To whom do I owe this wonderful rescue?" asked the girl as soon as she had recovered.
"Phil Stanton—from San Mario," he grinned.
"Again let me thank you," smiled the girl.
"I hope we may meet again," Phil stammered, but the girl and the car made a dash for the door, but the Indians blocked her way and would not permit her flight. As she struggled to free herself, a pretty Indian girl, Moonlight, approached her and whispered: "Pretend to yield—I will help you later."

Ruth stopped struggling and listened to Gray Wolf, who told her that no harm would come to her as long as she remained there peacefully. He ordered Moonlight to take the girl to her chambers, after which Ruth was to meet the medicine men in council.
"What is this all about?" she asked Moonlight, as soon as they were alone.
"It is because you bear the sign of the trident," explained the Indian girl. "When you were four years of age, your father married the Princess Blue Wing, chiefess of these two tribes of Canyon Indians—the Buffalo and Blue Wing. Your father and Blue Wing were very happy but one day he had to go back to his people. He never returned, and Blue Wing died of a broken heart. Now, while you are in no way a blood relation of Blue Wing, Gray Wolf believes you are the rightful ruler of the tribes, the Buffaloes or Blue Hawks, should come into possession of the Golden Pool."

As Ruth was about to question Moonlight and gain more information about the Golden Pool, an Indian entered. "Gray Wolf requests Princess White Eagle to appear," he said.
Before Ruth left Moonlight she managed to whisper, "Get word to Phil Stanton at the ranch that I am a prisoner."

Ruth waited for some time at the door of the council chamber before she was admitted. Gray Wolf had been forming the two tribes of the land significance of the girl's presence. She, on the other hand, perceived the delay would continue, as she knew Phil would hurry to her as soon as he learned the true facts. She decided to spar for time before the unsuspecting chief.

"Now that our white chiefness is found," Gray Wolf spoke, "we had again been presented, 'she will soon in her wisdom decide to whom the Golden Pool belongs. Tomorrow we will make ready to return to the hidden canyon to bring to our people our long sought chiefness.'" As he spoke on, Ruth was much relieved to see Moonlight signalling her from the door. She understood that help was at hand and it would only be a matter of a few moments.

But suddenly the noise of battle and much shouting reached the councilors in their chamber. Gray Wolf and his chiefs rushed from their places to find the source of the outbreak. Ruth saw that her moment had arrived, and unobserved she slipped from the room with Moonlight.

Meanwhile Phil was climbing one of the scaling ladders to Ruth's room, but just as he got to the top, four Indians sprang on him. He managed to elude them by pushing the ladder over, and before they realized their footing was in the room with the girl. Sliding down a vine, she reached the ground in safety, and ran across the short space to the outer wall with the Indians hot after them. Phil knew that both could not escape, so he turned suddenly and faced his pursuers while Ruth reached the top of the wall and watched her champion's struggle.

Phil was outnumbered, the girl saw this. She was about to go to his aid when from the outer side of the wall a figure in white on a white horse dashed madly up, swooped down on her, and lifting her to his saddle, dashed away with her.
