USE The Want Ad Way

Wash All Ready For the Line---But My, What Biting Weather!

Housewives understand—but husbands as a rule do not. Any woman who has ever done a family washing "at home" knows what it means to slave over a washboard for hours, and then, when damp with perspiration, steam and suds, and with the feet tightly shod, to go out into the winter weather and hang clothes.

It's a dangerous procedure! Is it to be wondered at that women are the chief support of the medical fraternity? Is it not about time to reform?

Turn over a new leaf with 1920! Do it the WET WASH WAY.

THE SALE OF THE NEW YORK HERALD

Munsey Sole Owner Now—
History of Great Newspaper is Reviewed.

(New York Times)
Announced by the Herald-Commenting editorially upon its purchase of The New York Herald, New York and Paris editors, and The New York Evening Telegram, by Frank A. Munsey, The Herald says:

"Announcement is made by the executives of the estate of the late James Gordon Bennett, Rodman Wanamaker and the Guarantee Trust Company, that Frank A. Munsey, owner of the New York Sun, The Baltimore News, and the periodical bearing his name, has purchased all of the Bennett newspapers—The New York Herald, The Evening Telegram, and the European edition of The Herald, published in Paris.

"The transfer of these properties represents probably the most important newspaper deal in history.

"Mr. Munsey, in due time, will make known his plans and purposes with regard to the newly acquired newspapers. Readers of the Herald will have confidence that this newspaper, under its new ownership, will continue to maintain the high ideal in journalism which has characterized it from the day of its foundation by the elder Bennett.

"Mr. Munsey and the late James Gordon Bennett were close friends and were always in sympathy in their ideas with regard to the function and duties of a newspaper. The sale of the newspapers to Mr. Munsey is in accord with the desire as therein expressed is that The Herald be continued and developed to be an enduring monument to its great founder.

"Like Mr. Bennett, Mr. Munsey is a believer in and exponent of one-man direction. The late Mr. Bennett, Mr. Munsey has no other interest save his publishing interests—and that means his chief concern always is the interest of the public. In the ownership of The Herald and his other newspapers and magazine properties he has no partners; he has none in the ownership of The Herald.

"Of the chief interest to its readers is the assurance that under its new ownership The Herald will continue the policies which have always marked it throughout its wonderful history and that in the future, as in the past, it will be found always standing firmly for an undiluted Americanism and battling valiantly for the best interests of the American people."

The New York Herald made its appearance in the street of New York on the morning of May 6, 1885. It was a four-page sheet, was written in full on the head of a barrel, it was said—by its founder, James Gordon Bennett, Sr., and sold for one cent. The circulation of The Herald, from the start, fluctuated almost as much as its editorial policies with respect to politics and persons, and its last published circulation report showed that it had slightly more than 100,000 readers in its eighty-fifth year.

From its establishment until 1872 The Herald was directed by the elder Bennett and, upon his death, it passed to James Gordon Bennett, Jr., who held absolute sway over the news, papers, destinies, until May 14, 1898, when he died abroad, where for years he had lived and controlled his publication.

The knack of the elder Bennett for delivering sensational news got The Herald talked about, and in those days that spelled popularity and, what was more immediate interest, swelling circulation.

In the first month Mr. Bennett began innovations—the creative idea which, coupled with the policy of the "news at any cost," was later to bring The Herald to the front for a time in influence and popularity. He got the idea that folks were interested in the dogs of Wall Street and promptly brought The Herald to the front for a time in influence and popularity. He got the idea that folks were interested in the dogs of Wall Street and promptly brought The Herald to the front for a time in influence and popularity.

NEW YORK PRESS COMMENTS ON THE SIMS ASSERTIONS

Consensus of Opinion is That
Charges Must Be Investigated

Grave and Startling—Admiral's Statement Contrasted with a Speech He Made at the Guildhall in London.

The following editorials on Admiral Sims' charges appear in the New York papers:
The Post: The least important of the counts in the Sims indictment against the Navy Department has been most heavily played in the news. We cannot take seriously the "instructions" Admiral Sims asserts he received on the eve of his departure for England. A secretary of the navy might well have said to him: "You are going to France to plan co-operation with the British. Do your duty by the Allies, but give a thought to America, too," but give the strongest kind of evidence to prove that more than this was meant by whoever played Polonius at the Navy Department when Admiral Sims came to say goodbye.

Many more serious is the charge that Admiral Sims was sent abroad with a single attendant, and that he was left to cope with the enormous problems of organizing our naval action against Germany with utterly inadequate staff assistance.

The World: German commanders have to explain defeat. Admiral Sims goes out of his way to mar a victory.

Startling and Grave. The Evening Mail: Admiral Sims' charges against the Department of the Navy, and especially against Secretary Daniels and Admiral Benson, chief of naval operations during the war, are as startling as they are grave.

It is easier to credit Secretary Daniels' statements that in view of Admiral Sims' previous declaration in a speech in the British House of Commons, in the event of Great Britain being involved in a great war, she could "count upon every man, every dollar, every drop of blood" of her navy directed forces across the sea.

Secretary Daniels warned Sims against a similar premature commitment in a grave international crisis.

Sensational as this charge is on its face, the complaints made by the commander of our naval forces in the British region of operations after our entrance into the war are far more important and disturbing.

The American people are entitled to know whether they can rely upon the navy to do its work well or whether it is necessary to reorganize it from the top down.

Not Made in Haste. The Sun: It can hardly be said that Admiral Sims has made his criticisms of the Navy Department in haste or hot blood more than a year after the close of the war. It is equally impossible to attribute them to personal animosity for he accuses no one by name or title.

It must be remembered that the outcome of the naval campaign which he headed has placed him beyond suspicion of envy.

The injunction that he should not let England pull the wool over his eyes and so on, with the statement that this country would as soon fight her as Germany, remains an unexplained source of amazement and of scandal.

Secretary Daniels denies this morning that he used this strangely inappropriate language. So far, so good; the people of the United States will want to know who did. Doubtless when asked by the proper authority, say a committee of the Senate, Admiral Sims will tell. Then, perhaps, the utterer of the remark will explain, if he can. Assuredly the matter cannot and will not remain where it is.

The older a man grows the less he is disposed to see how near he can skate to a danger sign.
