Steam Navigation Company commercial policy. The inequalities more than met by the start she had in the race. Her insular position and maritime supremacy and her resources of coal, iron and cheap skilled labor gave additional advantages. But the levelling effects of time, steam and electricity and the advances made in mechanical science, in which she was mainly instrumental, have distributed some of these things abroad and, to encourage their pro_ gress and permanence within their orders, the rest of the world have mposed protective duties. Now, when the arrow of protected competition is directed in its flight by pinions from a wing of the bird against which it is aimed and the instinct of self-defence would natuturally raise a shield to stop it; we can hardly criticise such a prudential 25.00 act, no matter what our theories may be. The principle of reciprocity appears only reasonable in this light and emergency, and it is the motive of our individual conduct in our daily usiness. It follows that it must be the trade model of the nation, which, after all, is only the total of the people in corporate capacity. We deal with those who buy from us and they who boycott us we would fain boycott in return, not on principle or n revenge, but to teach them, it possible, better manners. The exchange of products between countries is their common source of wealth and not the payment of balances in coin all going one way, with an occasional addition of interest on account.
