Or, The Love Story of Charles Brandon and Mary Tudor, the King's Sister, and Happening In the Reign of His August Majesty King Henry the Eighth Rewritten and Rendered Into Modern English From Sir Edwin

And this proved what reason have I to suppose they are to be true in some respects.

We rode on rapidly and did not stop in London except to give the horses After crossing the bridge Mary said, half to Jane and half to herself, "I will never marry the French king-never." Mary was but a girl pitted against a body of brutal men, two of them rulers of the two greatest nations on earth—Wantonness is not among my thousand rather heavy odds for one woman. We rode down to Greenwich and en- you. You are sure enough of me in that tered the palace without exciting comment, as the princess was in the habit to believe you were too sure, that I had MORE LIVE STOCK FOR of coming and going at will. The king and queen and most of the courtiers were in London at Bridewell House and Baynard's castle, where was vigorously pushing the loan of 500,000 crowns for Mary's dower, the only business of state in which at that time he took any active interst. Subsequently, as you know, he became interested in the divorce laws and the various methods whereby a man, especially a king, might rid him-self of a distasteful wife, and after he saw the truth in Anne Boleyn's eyes he adopted a combined policy of church and state craft that has brought us a deal of senseless trouble ever since and

As to Mary's dower, Henry was to pay Louis only 400,000 crowns, but he made the marriage an excuse for an extra 100,000 to be devoted to his own When we arrived at the palace the girls went to their apartments and I to mine, where I found Brandon reading. There was only one window to our common room—a dormer window set into the roof and reached by a litset into the roof and reached by a lit-tie passage as broad as the window it-self and perhaps a yard and a half tong. In the alcove thus formed was a bench along the wall, cushioned by Brandon's great campaign cloak. In this window we often sat and read, and here was Brandon with his book. I had intended to tell him the girls were coming, for when Mary asked me if I thought he would come to her at the palace, and when I had again said no, palace, and when I had again said ho, she reiterated her intention of going to him at once; but my courage failed me and I did not speak of it.

I knew that Mary ought not to come to our room, and that if news of it had a reach the king's core there. uld reach the king's ears there would be more and worse trouble than ever, and as usual Brandon would pay the penalty for all. Then again, if it were discovered it might seriously com-promise both Mary and Jane, as the world is full of people who would rather say and believe an evil thing of another than to say their prayers or to believe the holy creed.

I had said as much to the Lady Mary when she expressed her determination to go to Brandon. She had been in the wrong so much of late that she was humbled, and I was brave enough to say whatever I felt, but she said she had thought it all over, and as every one was away from Greenwich it would not be found out if done se-

She told Jane she need not go; that the, Mary, did not want to take any Jane would have gone, though, had she known that all her fair name would go with her. She was right, you see, when she told me while riding over to Windsor that should Mary's love blossom into a full blown passion she would wreck everything and everybody, including herself perhaps, to attain the object of so great a desire. It looked now as if she were on the highroad to that end. Nothing short of chains and fetters could have kept her from going to Brandon that evenher that was irresistible and swept everything before it.

In our garret she was to meet another will, stronger and infinitely better controlled than her own, and I did not knew how it would all turn out.

CHAPTER XIL

HAD not been long in the room when a knock at the door when a knock at the door announced the girls. I admitted them, and Mary walked to growing dark, and the room was quite dim, save at the window where Brandon sat reading. Gods, those were exciting moments! My heart beat like a woman's. Brandon saw the girls when they entered, but never so much as looked up from his book. You must remember he had a great grievance. Jane and I had remained near the door, and poor Mary was a pitiable princess, standing there so full of doubt in the middle of the room. After a moment she stepped toward the window and, with quick coming breath, stopped at the threshold of the little passage.
"Master Brandon, I have come, not to

I now began to realize for the first time the wondrous power of this girl, and ceased to marvel that she had always been able to turn even the king, earth, to her own wishes. Her manner made her words eloquent, and already, with true feminine tactics, she had put Brandon in the wrong in everything because he was wrong in part.

in the faintest shading of a thought— not for heaven itself—not even for your love and forgiveness, much as they are to me, and I want to know that you are sure of my truthfulness, if you doubt all else. You see I speak plainly of what your love is to me, for although by remaining away you made me fear I had been too lavish with my favors—that is every woman's fear—I knew in my heart you loved me; that you could not have done and said what you did otherwise. Then she quickly went over what she had said to me. She told of her great dread lest the king should learn of the wish to Grouche's and its fatal consequences, knowing full well it would render Henry impervious to her influence and precipitate the French marriage. She told him of how she was going to the king the day after the arrest to ask his release, and of the meeting with Buckingham, and his promise.

Still Brandon said nothing and stood as if politely waiting for her to with draw.
