PETTY ANNOYANCES! BY MRS. GEORGE WASHINGTON WYLLYS.
"The petty annoyances of married life!"
We have seen a French novel bearing this mellifluous title, but we don't believe in it!
What does M. Balzac know about such patters? If you are at all curious on the subect, don't take it through a Fresch sieve, ut ask the first woman you weet, and see what she has to say!

Asking your husband for money and being told that "he has not got any," when you have just seen the peep of bank-bills through the cracks in his porte-monnaic. Buying a new dress, and being told that you look like a fright in it! Boiling up that ing told that "he has not got any," when you have just seen the peep of bank-bills through the cracks in his porte-monnaic. Buying a new dress, and being told that you look like a fright in it! Boiling up that old ham-bone for dinner, and having your husband bring home two or three unexpected friends to help gnaw it! Having your toes trod on, under the table, whenever you attempt to say anything. Being told that you are narrowing the same to be an alogies of nature; embodied in ancient allegories, and enforced by early usages of the Christian Church. Those who will, may turn these lessons to lasting profit.—Life Illustrated. attempt to say anything. Being told that you are narrowing down to a mere household attempt to say anything. Being told that you are narrowing down to a mere household drudge when you count the bars of soap and add up the weekly bills. Being informed Sunday. Loss heavy. No insurance. that you had a great deal better look after your husband and family, when you try to enlarge your mental faculties by reading.
Waiting dinner half an hour for your good man to come home, and then being fretted at, because the fish is spoiled by standing.

To the Inhabitants of Almonte and Surrounding Country. Being lightning-conductor and escape-valve in general to his wrath toward all mankind. And not being able to have your own way more than three fourths of the time after all

Is not that a formidable list of grievances? We challenge M. Balzac to beat it, if he can. Now, about a portion of the subject that he does not include within his volume, but which is, nevertheless, most important and worthy of special notice -the "petty annoyances" of unmarried life! Let the few of the most serious "annoyances."
Being obliged to go to church Sunday evenings all alone by yourself, and come home solus, without a cheering umbrella carried over your head, or a nice shaggy great coat to snug up against! Being under the necessity of drawing your own money out of the bank, and spending it, without help or hindrance. To be compelled to scold impudent hachmen, and remonstrate with The London obdurate wood-sawyers and conscie coal-carriers, all by yourself. To be hustled about, and have your trunk taken to the wrong hotel, and the cover lost off your band-box, and to be over charged and under treated, generally, whenever you go on a journey. To answer the questions of the census-taker, without wincing, particularly when he wants to know how old you are and whether you have ever been married Being called "an old maid" by every seven teen-year-old minx of your acquaintance Not being able to say to the dry-goods clerk when you are purchasing a new shawl, "Well, I'll see what my husband thinks about it!" Sitting all alone by a good fire on a long winter's evening, with nobody's stockings to mend, and nobody's footstep to wait and listen for. Having nobody to scold, when you feel in the scolding humor, Huntington. and nobody to coax when you feel amiable disposed. Standing in the railroad depo and witnessing the good-bye scene between a not bad-looking man, who is going to Albany, and his pretty young wife, who isn't! Having nobody to lean your head against when you want to go to sleep in the cars.

And—but here! we have said enough. If this glimpse of evidence does not convince any reasonable being that women know quite ton. Chair to be taken at 6 o'clock p.m., when about the "petty annoyances of life," when Revs. G. McRitchie, W. McGill, and both married and unpravided without being both married and unmarried, without being preached at by a French philosopher, we give up the attempt!—Life Ill.

DECEMBER-ITS LESSONS.

December, the season of clouds, and driz-zle, and pale, sickly sunshine—December, December, the season of clouds, and driz-zle, and pale, sickly sunshine—December, the darkest and gloomiest month in the year—has come. The sun has attained its low--has come. The sun has attained its lowest declension in the southern heavens, and the white mantle of snow is gradually spread ing from the arctic regions down through the temperate zone, shrouding the face of have cast their foliage, the grass is seared and dead, the birds have flown to a sunnier elime, the night of the year has come, and external nature has sunk to repose.

The long evenings are beguiled by the social party, by music and dancing, by games, jokes, badinage and gossip; and gayety and mirth preside in each group of youths and maidens. Sad, however, is the lot of the poor the lonely and destitute, as they shiver round their smouldering embers, or crouch beneath their tatters upon their pallets of straw while the wind is streaming through their broken panes, and while they count over and over again, the long, weary months, weeks, and days that must elapse ere the comforts of a more genial atmosphere can be restored to them. Would that December which, with the rich and pallets of straw while the wind is stream well-to-do, inaugurates the cheer and festivities of the winter fireside, did also, in a corresponding degree, bring with it an awakened and vigilant Christian charity! Each season of the year also has its mo-

Rach season of the year also has its moral and spiritual significance, and each acts upon the faculties in a specific manner to complete the cycle of their exercises and develop the soul to its fully rounded proportions. In the mythology of the old Egyptians December was the period when the destroying giant, Typhon, was in the exercise his full power—typifying the reign of darkness and evil, which the good principle, personified as Osiris, newly born at the winter solstice, was soon to invade and progressivel overcome by sending forth the more bland atmosphere and more genial sunshine of a new physical and moral spring. The wise men of those ancient times, understanding seemingly, far better than the philosophers of our own day, the correspondence between nature without and the soul within, and the various periodical states and changes of one with those of the other, found in the rolling seasons a never-failing source of instruction and moral admonition; and the progressive dying out of the old, and revival of the new year, was to them explanatory and repre-sentative of the death of the old man with his lusts and selfish vanities, and a regene ration of the soul to a newness of innocency and purity of affection and thought. It may be here incidentally remarked, that all the leading religions of the ancient nations orireligions of the ancient nations originated, no doubt, from a foundation of truth as laid in a primitive divine revelation and even when they became corrupted into the forms of the subsequent and multifarious idolatries, they still retained some dim and ill understood traces of their original divineness; and this is exemplified in the Egyptian myth above referred to.
