CHECKMATED. Good Reasons Why the Rival Band

Did Not Win In the Contest. "I once belonged to a country band when I was a youngster," said the talkative man. "It was great sport, and no man has really lived unless he has belonged to such an organization at some period in his life. There was a great rivalry between the band that I was a member of and one that was located in an adjoining town. When the rivalry was at white heat, a band contest was held in a neighboring town. We were both entered in the same class and only asked for a free field and no favors.

"Now, the class that we were entered in called for bands having at least sixteen members, and the best we could do after scouring the town for talent was fifteen men who understood how to push wind through brass instruments and have it resemble music. We were in despair until I conceived a happy idea. There was an odd character living in the town whom every one called George. He was only half witted and had attached himself to our band, making himself generally useful by carrying our music and taking care of our bandroom. My plan was to fit him out with an instrument securely corked and trust to luck that the deception would not be noticed.

"But the plan proved a most disastrous one. A member of the rival band, seeing the youth proudly carrying a horn, mistrusted what we were up to, and, getting the boy aside, he discovered the cork and pulled it out.

"When we started playing in the great contest. I became aware at once that some one was making horrible discords, and, turning around, I discovered to my horror that the half witted youth, imnensely proud of his position, was filling his instrument to the full extent of his lung power. It is hardly necessary to state that we did not win the contest."—

"For what?" he asked.

"Advertising," she replied. "I've been using your ladies' writing room for nearly a year in corresponding with my friends."

"And our paper and envelopes, too?" he suggested.
"Yes," she answered, "and that is just why I think you owe me something. Your name is on every sheet in pretty, sed letters, and just think how good I've done you by sending it all over the country."—Chicago Post.
