McIntyre, with Gen. Hains, the prisoner's father, and Major Hains, his brother, spent two hours with the captain in the corridor outside his cell trying to get from him a coherent recital of the events leading up to the shooting of William E. Annis. Capt. Hains seemed dazed. Not an intelligible word could his counsel-draw from him.

At 5 o'clock Mr. McIntyre gave it up and started into the captain's cell to get his overcoat and umbrella. The cell was dark save for a faint ray that came from an electric light in the corridor. As Mr. McIntyre groped about a shadow appeared behind him. He turned to see Capt. Hains stealing stealthily into the cell.

The captain silently closed the door behind him and in a menacing attitude advanced towards his lawyer. Mr. McIntyre felt a creepy sensation as the captain eyed him. Capt. Hains saw the curved handle of the umbrella. In the uncertain light it took on the appearance of the handle of a revolver. Crouching, the captain reached for the supposed weapon, the while keeping his eyes riveted upon the uncom fortable Mr. McIntyre. He had the umbrella handle in his grasp when McIntyre called to Thornton Hains: "Come here, Thornton, Peter wants to see you."
