For Her Sake; The Murder in Furness Wood.

CHAPTER XLIV. "Her heart is not in it," thought the housekeeper.

She retired to her own suite of rooms, and stood by one of the windows, longing to be engaged in something, however trifling, to banish her miserable thoughts, when she was suddenly startled by the cry of an animal in pain.

Until the day she died Lady Clan would never forget the scene that presented itself to her astonished eyes. Her husband was sitting smoking in the shade of a stately elm. He had set two dogs to fight, and was eagerly urging them on, enjoying the combat with undisguised delight.

Lord Clanronald was very sulky with her during the remainder of the day; but Diana would not notice it. The little dog suffering terribly, and one of the grooms was dispatched for a veterinary surgeon, as it was feared that Floss would die.

From the whispered comments of the groom and the surgeon she gathered that it was not the first time his lordship had distinguished himself by cruelty toward animals.

"Call off that big dog at once!" she cried. "Call off that big dog at once!" she cried. "Call off that big dog at once!" she cried.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

"Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked. "Why do you not seem to hear her, Diana?" she asked.

CHAPTER XLV. Lord Clanronald stood on the lawn, smoking his morning cigar. With him was his best friend—if such an epithet could be applied to Captain Basil Egerton, of the Royal Horse Guards—with flashing eyes, "take care that you do not repeat your offense! If you set those dogs to fight again, I will brand you as a coward before the whole world!"

"Do you think," she asked, "that animals were created in order that men might amuse themselves by their torture?"

"I have never thought about it," he said; "I do not want to be cruel to the dogs. But, be that as it may, Diana, you must not again behave like that to me."

"I am glad you admire her," returned Lord Clanronald. "She is a handsome woman, and high spirited, too. But I have been thinking—and I am right for once in my life in the opinion I have formed—that she is too high-flown for me."

"I can imagine," said Basil Egerton, "that you find her so." "She was so perfectly beautiful in face and figure that I was carried off my feet, and I never thought about what they call 'mind.' Indeed, it is the last thing I ever trouble about in any one."

"I find it out now," resumed Lord Clanronald. "She is too high-flown for me altogether. She believes in all kinds of romantic nonsense, would die at a dog-fight, talks of sermons in stones and brooks, goes into raptures over a half-blown rose, likes the early morning and the dew on the grass. Now what is the use of such a wife to me?"

"Very true," said Basil Egerton. "But how is it you did not discover this before?"

"I never thought of it. It was her face that fascinated me and caused me to forget everything else."

"If her face was enough then, why is it not enough now?" asked the captain.

"I am tired of it," replied his companion. "It is all through this foolish custom of honeymoons. I have seen one else, no other face for so long—a state of things which brings about its own results."

Captain Egerton laughed at the thought of his friend's matrimonial dilemma.

"You have done a thousand times better than you deserved," he said. "To tell you the truth, Ronald, your great surprise is that you were able to win her; she might have aimed much higher."

"I do not consider that I was a bad match for her," rejoined Lord Clanronald, sulkily.

"Perhaps not. But she might have done much better—she might indeed; and I wonder she did not."

Lord Clanronald looked straight into his friend's face.

"Basil," he said—"do not be afraid of wounding my feelings—tell me—do you think my wife loves me?"

It's the flavour of H.P. sauce that makes it quite unique. You can taste the delicious oriental fruits and spices so perfectly blended.

thought of his friend's matrimonial dilemma.

"You have done a thousand times better than you deserved," he said.

"I do not consider that I was a bad match for her," rejoined Lord Clanronald, sulkily.

"Perhaps not. But she might have done much better—she might indeed; and I wonder she did not."

Lord Clanronald looked straight into his friend's face.

"Basil," he said—"do not be afraid of wounding my feelings—tell me—do you think my wife loves me?"

"No," replied his friend; "I should say most decidedly that she does not."

"She has money; she could not have married me for money. It was not for that. I am sure, nor for my title—for she thinks less of the title, as I happen to know, than she does of the man."

"For all that, it is a good old title," observed Basil Egerton.

"I am proud of it; she is not," said Lord Clanronald. "Now, Basil, you have a better knowledge of these matters than I have; you understand women, and I do not—tell me frankly what do you think she married me for?"

"Frankly, I cannot," replied his friend. "I was puzzled when I saw her. She is a grand woman, noble by nature; and you—well, to put it as lightly as I can, you are essentially human. Tell me what you thought she married you for."

"I thought she was very fond of me," said Lord Clanronald.

"Why do you not think so now?" asked the captain.

The other laughed a little unsteadily. "A man can soon tell if his wife cares for him. She never seems to see me, but ignores me as much as she can; and her contemptuous looks when I venture to speak tell me that she has not that love she ought to have for me; I am less in her eyes than the grass on which she treads." He thought of the box on the ears that she had given him; but he did not mention it. "Do you never see her lip curl when I speak?" he continued.

"And I have just as much right to express my opinions as she has. My own belief is that she has a most horrible temper."

"No woman is worth anything without a touch of temper," said Basil Egerton, laughing.

AUSTRALIAN ELECTION. LONDON, Nov. 14. The Sydney correspondent of the Morning Post says the Federal election campaign is now fairly launched and there is every prospect of a fight for the "soldiers' votes." The Executive of the Returned Soldiers Association seems to hold for Premier Hughes, but their organization is still loose and many of the rank and file are uncertain. Apparently the soldiers' vote will decide between the two parties.
