LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.
 CHAPTER XXV.

MANGLES' REVELATIONS.
 "Och, my jewel, if only shammie ye are, because your friends are here. But never mind them, avick. Musha thin, what need we care for them at all, at all? Don't be ashamed, my purty darlint, for sure ye are fond uv me."

"Curse you, let go," shouted the Squire with furious wrath, and making at the same time an effort with his whole strength, he wrenched away her arm and dropped her with a thud on the floor beside the table, which was upset by her fall, and the contents flowed away in a stream.

No one wanted to see what further transpired; for the moment the Squire had been seen to fall, he dashed through the open door and along the dark passage, forgetful in his haste of the step, which again tripped him, and sent him stumbling forward to the head of the stair, where he recovered himself, and made his way down without further mishap. When the others got to the street they found him seated in the cab, where he had waited all the time, and, though he was very red and flushed, he was ready to join in the laughter which it was impossible for them to suppress.

"A fine report I shall have to give to Mrs. Oakley of your doings in London, Squire, exclaimed the lawyer.

"Mad, she'll know all about it before you see her. Upon my soul, it isn't pleasant, though, to be hugged by a drunken old hag like that. Weggate you know?"

"Not I," laughed the lawyer with great emphasis. "I was never so hugged in all my life. However, it's something for Mother McGee to boast of for the rest of her days. It's not every old Irishwoman who can say she has kissed a handsome English Squire."

"She didn't kiss me. I'll swear that; but she did her best, the hloons, my brute. Allerton, you owe me something for incurring such danger in your behalf."

"I owe you more than can be expressed," exclaimed Edwin. "Without you we should never have found Mangles, or received the important and satisfactory information he has given us."

"Don't mention it, my boy—don't mention it. I am delighted to have been of this service to you. I did not think my former experience of the gaming table would ever have turned to such good account."

"Thus, gaily and in high spirits, they rattled on till they reached the lawyer's chambers in Milk Street. They then adjourned to a hotel, where they partook of a hearty meal, after which the Squire bade them good-bye, and departed for Oakley Grange, with a promise on his side and Edwin's that an acquaintance so happily begun should not be allowed to drop."

The lawyer also went away, for he had to arrange that afternoon for Mangles' transference to better lodgings.

Edwin and Ritchie, left alone, gazed at each other for some moments in eloquent silence.

"Well, Ritchie, what do you think of it?" asked Edwin at length.

"Oh, Master Edwin, it's grand," burst forth Ritchie.

He had kept silent all through the interview in Mangles' lodgings, but with open mouth he drank in every word which the latter had uttered, and now he was able to express his mind upon it.

"It's grand," he repeated. "Everything we thought has come true, and Master Bridgenorth is an innocent man. I'm grieved o' a' for Miss Heelan and Master Hermann, for there's nothing to separate them now. But, heeh me, what a vagabond that Mangles is. Preserve us a' I didn't think sic a blackguard as he owns himself' tae be could hae an existence."

"Never mind," said Edwin, gaily, "all is clear now, and I shall have a welcome letter to send to Ardenadam, which reminds me that I must about it now, for it will be a long epistle, and we start on our journey to the seat of war to-morrow."

That night, at a late hour, the long and precious communication was put into the Post Office, and next day Edwin and Ritchie were speeding on to where the dark cloud of war had gathered.

The busier and more exciting the mode of life, the greater the number of insane persons, and vice versa. It has been ascertained that the proportion of insane to sane persons in America is one in every 562; in Scotland it is 1 to 574. In the agricultural districts of England the proportion is one to 820, while in London it is 1 to 400.
