with an inward chuckle, "what a humbug you are!"
Mrs. Wilton meanwhile was feeling somewhat out of touch with these fine people. Her birth entitled her to a place amongst them, but her life in the colony had precluded the possibility of many acquaint ances in English society. Esther's beauty attracted attention, and under the auspices of Lady Heron her social success seemed assured. Her name was heing spoken on all sides. Mrs. Wilton found that she had suddenly become "Miss Wilton's mother." But her love for her daughter made her content that it should be so. Lady Heron's doubts and fears were laid this afternoon.
Miss Runton's attention was divided between Esther and Lord Rutherford. She looked on at Esther's triumph, and saw Miss Ruther's and Lord Rutherford. She looked on at Esther's triumph, and saw how, beside her, the other two debutantes looked small and commonplace. Agnes thought herself pretty, but she knew that near Esther her charm dwindled.

She tried to analyze her feelings with regard to Miss Wilton. She admired her as she had never admired a woman before, but she could not tell whether she most liked or hated her. She saw that Rutherford's eyes were only for the new-comer, and, oddly enough, this gave Esther an attraction for her.

"He loves you," she thought, addressing Esther in imagination. "You are so beautiful, it gives one no chance. It is not fair. I don't think I bear you any ill-will. I only wish I had never seen you.

Perhaps, if the truth were known, he did see it only too well. Possibly his easy friendliness was his armament wherewith to protect himself and her. Do not laugh at Agnes' thoughts just because in their intricacies they happen to remind you of the story of the girl who did not like cabbage though she would eat it, and she could not bear it.

Miss Runton was fully in earnest. She

He was very good-looking, and a younger son, and in his own fashion he was more or less in love with her. It pleased her to see that she had a certain power over him, and she kept him in reserve as a pis-aller. Their filtrations took the form of snappy retorts. They fought their way through the smart crowd to the dining-room. She asked for coffee, and he told her she must have tea—the coffee was at the other end of the room. She would not have tea.

Then she should not have anything.

"Very well, get me tea, for goodness" ake."

And he thereupon brought her coffee.

And he thereupon brought her coffee.

Then they quarreled about a chair which he had not fetched for her at once, and which had since been appropriated by someone else. Miss Runton was standing against the door, and balancing her cup as best she could in the jostling throng. She began to laugh.

Lady Hurlingham struggled through the crowd.

"My dear Agnes, here you are! I have been looking for you everywhere. You must come at once. Don't you remember that we are going on to the Stephens?"

She bowed distantly to Newport, and then she remembered that there might be some difficulty in finding her carriage, so she smiled sweetly.

"I would be so good of you."

A few minutes later he was standing bareheaded in the road, helping the two ladies into their brougham. Agnes made a little face at him as they drove off. She listened indifferently to her mother's lecture. She was siding with her father just then.

GOSSIP OF TO-DAY.

Hurlingham, "to send Mr. Hartley an invitation for my bail. He has, or had, two hundred thousand pounds. No, I suppose I could not do that, as Lady Heron will not meet him. I will ask him to dinner. It might be your privilege to reform him, Agnes,"

Miss Runton laughed.
"How funny you are, mamma!" she said.
"I really don't think you see through your self."

"I really don't think you see through yourself."

Lord Rutherford meanwhile left the white house in an uncertain frame of mind. He was happy, excited, and uneasy at the same time. Again Esther Wilton's success—as on the night when she had surprised Lady Heror's guests with the excellence of her singing—was to him a great and a personal joy. But mingled with these feelings was a jealous misgiving which brought its own pain. Hitherto Miss Wilton had, in London, belonged to his aunt and—himself. Now this was changed. No longer would those china-hunting expeditions be possible. Miss Wilton would be known in the world, since all these great ladies were evidently bent upon taking her up, and she must only be seen at the right times and in the right places. No hope now of a repetition of the steamboat experience. She could be his no longer unless—

Ah, the saving clause of that unless! He longed, yet feared, to say the words which must decide his fate. So much depended upon her answer—a gain unspeakable, or a loss irreparable.

Sometimes he almost persuaded himself that she cared for him. He knew that his presence was agreeable to her. He had seen her face light up at his appearing. He shrank from hazarding even the loss of her good will. In though he called her all the threadbare names by which the lover, from time unknown, has called his mistress—his queen, his star, his idol—and each seemed meaningless and inadequate when applied to her. "Such style, and so well taught! I only wish I could get lessons from the same man for Agnes. Yes, she is an Australian; Melbourne, I think. That is the mother, that pale woman talking to Mr. Newport." Lord Hurlingham overheard some of this. "Good Lord, Lady H.," he said to himself with an inward chuckle, "what a humbug you are!"

Savage or half-civilized princes often prefer death to exile in a foreign country. Malietoa, the King of Samoa, jumped overboard when the Germans took him to the Gilbert Islands, and was not rescued with his own consent. Three chiefs of the Comoro Islands, off the East African coast, were taken away from home three months ago on account of the revolution which they headed against the French. They were very unhappy on board ship, and when the vessel reached Obock they tried to jump overboard and were placed in irons to prevent further suicidal attempts.
