How 'he Sultan Eats.

How 'he Sultan Eats.

The Sultan nover uses a plate. He takes all his food direct from the little kettles, and nover uses a table, and rarely a kinfe or fork a spoon, his bread, a pankake, or fingers are found far handier. It requires just twice as many slaves as there are courses to serve a dimer to him. The whole household is at liberty to take meals where it suits him or her best, and thus every one is served with a small tray, with a great chink of bread, and the higher ones get the paneakes. Nearly one ton of rice per day is required for the inevitable pillaffe, 600 pounds of singar, as much collee, to say nothing of the other greeceries, fruit, vegetables and meat. Rice and mutton and bread form the greatest part of the food for the majority of Turks, together with fish, sweetments, confectionery, nuts, and dried and fresh fruits. That there is enormous waste and extravagance in the kitchen is obvious, and it is said that enough is thrown away daily to maintain 100 families; but such waste is perhaps not confined to a Turkish royal household, and might also be found in kitchens nearer home. The zurplus is gathered up by the beggars in whom Constantinople abounds, and what still remains is eaten by the scavenger dogs. All the water for the Sultan's use and the drinking water for the household is brought in barrels from two pretty streams at different places in the Bosphorus towards the Black Sea.
