

Now that the warm weather is rapidly approaching, the mind of the progressive physician will most naturally turn towards thinking over the usual class of cases met with by the general practitioner in the summer months. First and foremost on the list comes the question of the treatment of infants during the hot season of the year, when affected by such dread disease as cholera infantum. Then it is that the doctor has to devise some form of nutritious and easily digested food for the sickly little one. At such trying times, if the medical man, having that infant's best interests at heart, will make a trial at least of that oldest of all infant foods, Robinson's patent Barley or patent Groats, he will almost surely find that thereafter it will be a case of steady improvement upon the part of that infant. Patent Barley and Groats is manufactured by the well-known firm of Keen, Robinson & Co., of London, England, and any physician sending a post-card to F. Magor & Co., Montreal, will have sent him, free of charge, a large sample tin of either food.
