Sir Hilton's
BY GEORGE MANVILLE FENN,
Author of "Black Blood," "A Woman Worth Winning," "Master of Ceremonies," "The New Mistress," "The Meeting of Crooks," "Drawn Swords," Etc.

But, oddly enough, the night bird did not examine his injury but placed his boots as if ready for cleaning—of which they were very much in need—in the very lightest spot he could find; that is to say full in the afternoon lamp-light.

Then he began to muse.

"Soft as a hair cushion in a home-pier," he muttered. "Now, I could just lie down, and do my doos like a prince. Nobody at home but the servants and then girls. The two ladies gone off with the doctor in the carriage, 't'other one waiting at the Talbot, and the boss and the young squire asleep in off-steamer's parlour. 'Tisn't it one 'I'm in doubt about is Marky Willers, and that there black looking crowsville in the white choker."

"Hah!" he sighed, taking out a steel-toe-bacon and knife, and cutting off a bit of pigtail. "Mustn't smoke," he mused, "and I mustn't sleep, for it's ten to one I shouldn't wake till someone found me, and there'd be a squawk and a 'Dad me! I only come in by mistake, thinking it was my own room.' Well, that's the beauty of a bit of pigtail. Now then, I'll pose I'd better get to work on this head of mine."

Down to a race here and a race there, and a call or two on the way to do a bit of trade with a dawg, and a look round for any bit or two of rubbish that wants clearing away. Don't want anything heavier than a silver instand, say, check is so full of coppers, and a racing cup or anything of that sort won't lie flat without my hammer one side in and that's a pity, and it's half-round even then. Presentation instand's my favorite, for one can button it up in front or behind, while you can leave the bottles in, see the people wants to write.

"No, no, no, my plate here, I'll bet," said the man with a saw, his jaw grinding slowly away at the wood. "But I'm not on plate, thankie. Now then, where's that see, but it that there blessed dawg howls there won't be no dawg when I gets out."

The man rose in the moonlight, fumbled for an old matchbox, opened it, held for a second, and then struck a match and was in the act of striking a match when a clock in the hall performed a magical clock loudly four times with every bell sounding silvery and clear, and then paused.

"What a ghastly row!" muttered the man, and then he raised the match again, when—

Boom! boom! boom! three heavy strokes deliberately upon a deep-toned spring, produced a wonderful effect.

There was a sharp ejaculation, a loud rustle and a bump as of some one springing to their feet, while in the moonlight something like a hughly thick turned on reaching the floor into a quadruped, which crept silently into the conservatory and disappeared.

"Wall!" exclaimed a voice. "Think of me sleeping like that! Three o'clock—lamp gone out—nobody come home even now. What a shame! This is a nuisance, and I'm leaving up poor unprotected woman all alone in this big place, and not a man near but the gardener, and then so far off that they might squelch the house down before they'd hear. Well, I shall go to bed. Ugh! I feel quite shivery, and the place looks horrid in the dark. I don't like to go into the pantry."

for a light. I know; her ladyship's writing-table.

Jane Gee stepped quickly into the moonlight, caught sight of something on the carpet, and uttered a fearful shriek, just as a figure passed the French window, turned back, stopped short, and began to tap.

CHAPTER XXII.
The Coming Home.

"Oh, oh, oh!" cried the girl. "It's Mark! Oh, oh, oh!" she kept on in a peculiar sob. But she tottered to the window and undid the brass latch with trembling hands, when Mark pressed the glass door open, sprang in, closed the seat, fastened it, and, flinging one arm round the sobbing girl, clasped a hand over her mouth.

"Hold your row, you silly fool! Couldn't you see it was me?"

"Ye-yes, Mark, Oh, I'm so glad you're come."

"Seems like it—speaking everybody else out of bed to come and letch me."

"Oh, oh, Mark dear!" sobbed the girl. "Take care, and she clung to him, and she was weeping."

"Why, of course, I will," whispered the girl, "I didn't know you could come hysteric like that, and as he spoke he tried to comfort the trembling girl, succeeding to some extent, while another singular thing took place in that certainly unhaunted room.

For the big ugly pair of boots began, not to walk according to their nature when set in motion, but to glide in a regular way in the moonlight, following their assigned string, passing round the head of the quilted couch and into the conservatory, but without a sound.

"Oh, oh, Mark!" sobbed the girl, with a shudder.

"What, beginning again?" whispered Jane.

"But come away. Come on."

"No, no; not that way. Oh!"

"No, no; or you'll be waking someone," whispered Mark.

"I can't help it," sobbed Jane. "I wasn't you that frightened me, Mark, dear, it was the burglars."

"The what? Where?"

"Oh, I'd dropped asleep, Mark, and the lamp burnt out, and the clock woke me up, and then I saw it. Oh, horrid!"

"Be quiet, I tell you. What did you see?"

"That great big pair of boots in the moonlight there."

"Where?" cried Mark, doubtfully.

"Down there, by the blue couch."

"Stuff! There ain't no boots—old boots nor any other boots."

"Ain't there, Mark? Oh, there was, there was."

"Boh!" said the girl, after a long stare about the moonlit target. "I thought I saw them. Then, with a quick glance, 'whether have you been?'"

"Oh, only to the races with the gaffer."

"But you ain't been racing, till this time o' night?" cried the girl, suspiciously.

"Well, not quite. Some on 'em—bookies and jock—got up a bit of dinner."

"I don't believe it. What for?"

"All along o' setting up, and that sort of thing."

"Setting up? What's that—paying up?"

"Yes, my gal."

"I know what that means. Now then, out with it."

"What till the morning," said Mark, grinning.

"How much was it? No keeping it back. If you do, it's all off, and I'll never speak to you again. Now then, let this be a lesson to you. I will know how much you've lost?"

"Guess."

"I won't guess. It's too serious a matter."

"So it is, my lass; so it is, and I'll make a clean breast of it, Jenny."

"Yes, you'd better."

"I've won!" he cried, catching the girl in his arms.

"What! I don't believe it."

"I have, and enough, with what the brewers would advance, to take a nice little country pub—one we can make into a hotel."

"Ah, well," said Jane, primly. "It ain't no time to be talking about no hotel's nor public-house, in the middle o' the night like this."

"Why not?"

"Because it ain't proper. Look here; is Mr. Trimmer coming home?"

"No, nobody's come back but you. What about master? Is he long with her ladyship?"

"No; he was took bad just afore the race, but Dr. Granton gave him a pick-me-up that kep' him going till he'd won the race."

"Her ladyship had given him a talk-ink to, I suppose?"

Mark grinned, winbled, and lifted his elbow in a peculiar way, suggestive of drinking.

"O'h!h!" exclaimed Jane, in a half-whisper. "What a shame!"

"Sh!" whispered the groom. "Not a word. Don't say a word to a soul, wouldn't have trusted anyone else with it. Jenny, I believe it was only a glass or two of fizz on the top of a bucketful of excitement, because he was going to ride."

"But there it is, you see, Mark; horses and racing lead to drinking, and I mean

Daily Fashion Hint for Times Readers.

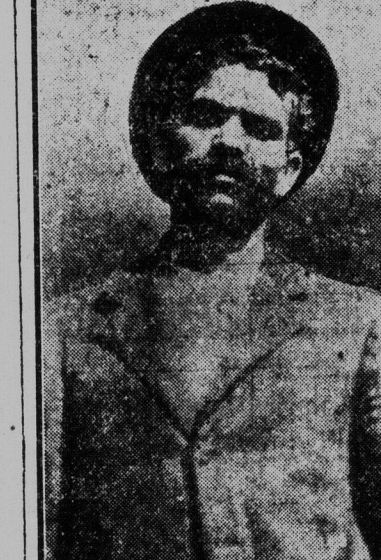

ON THE BEACH IN HER JUMPER.

Very sensible mothers add joy to the playtime hours of their small daughters by dressing them in those very comfortable jumpers of linen or gingham, which are slipped on over the little under waist and panties, thus doing away with any frills or furfulness of dress or petticoats. These little jumpers are made in one piece; that is, the waist and the bloomers are cut in one, and the bloomers are finished at the bottom with a band that buttons around the knees, or is run with elastic. The sleeves are cut comfortably large, though long; this is a protection against the heat of the sun; the neck is finished with a flat, round collar. Sandals, or straw slippers and socks and bare legs, and a dainty sun-bonnet complete this playtime outfit.

TOM DAVIDD COMMITTED

The Assyrian Must Stand Trial on the Charge of Murder.

Fredericton, N. B., July 23—Tom David, the Assyrian charged with murdering his wife, was this afternoon committed for trial, was this afternoon committed for trial by Magistrate Mareh at the next term of the York circuit court, which meets in January. He was asked by the court if he had any statement to make and through his counsel replied in the negative.

Proceedings in court today made it quite clear that the unwritten law and the brain storm theory will play a prominent part in the defence of the prisoner whom the case comes up for trial. Four witnesses were examined by the prosecution today and the most important evidence brought out was that of an Assyrian named Andrews who under cross-examination swore that the murdered woman and a man named Charles Nicholas had roomed together at his house in Woodstock for several weeks prior to the shooting.
