The chief objection, to the last shipment, he writes, was the time consumed in getting them here, with the result that they became overripe and had to be disposed of in the local market, instead of the majority of them being shipped to other points in the Dominion. In this connection it is probable that on the northbound trip from Jamaica, the Sicilian will not stop at Cuba, but proceed to St. John via Boston. This will cut down the trip considerably. The Sicilian will still stop at Havana on her southbound voyage.

FIFTEEN MINUTES OF RADIO EACH DAY

By Edward N. Davis Formerly Technical Electrical Expert For U. S. Government

Lesson No. 6.

THE RADIO TRANSMITTER Before proceeding to explain in detail the construction and operation o Before proceeding to explain in detail the construction and operation of the various pieces of apparatus used in radio transmission, it is very essential that the student have clearly in his mind an outline of the fundamental circuits of a radio transmitter. By knowledge of these circuits and a general understanding of the functions of their component parts, a definite foundation is acquired upon which to apply the more detailed explanations, which are to follow, concerning each item of apparatus necessary for the proper generation and transmission of electric waves.

The simple diagram, shown with this lesson, contains the essential features of a radio transmitter. The student should refer constantly to this diagram and its accompanying explanation in order to grasp thoroughly the principles of operation. A few items of apparatus such as instruments for the measurement of voltage, current, and power in different parts of the circuit, the starting box for the direct current motor, the regulator in the circuit of the alternating current generator, and so forth, have been intentionally omitted and will be included in lessons which are to follow.

An explantion of the manner in which this circuit functions is as follows: The direct current motor (M) receives current from an outside source usually at a pressure of 110 votts, which produces rotation of the revolving elements, or armature, of the motor. The armature of the alternating current generator (G) being mounted on an extension of the motor shaft is caused to revolve by the mechanical energy imparted, through the shaft, by the motor. Revolution of the generator armature develops an alternating current at a pressure usually between 110 and 500 volts, depending upon the mechanical construction and electrical connections of the generator.

By closing the transmitting key (K) the alternating current developed by the generator flows through the primary winding (P) of the power transformer (T.) The rapidly changing magnetic field caused by the current in the primary winding cuts the secondary winding (S) and induces a current in the secondary winding at a greatly increased pressure ranging from 10,000 to 20,000 volts depending upon the design of the transformer.

volts depending upon the design of the transformer.

The battery of condensers (C) are connected across the terminals of the secondary winding (S) and these condensers store up a charge for each alternation of the current in the secondary winding. When the condenser has charged to its full capacity it discharges with very rapid oscillations across the spark gap (G) through the primary winding (P') of the oscillation transformer (OT.) These oscillations are transferred from the primary winding (P') to the secondary winding (S') of the oscillation transformer and part of the energy of the oscillations is radiated from the antenna or aerial (A) in the form of electromagnetic waves. The aerial tuning inductance (I) and the short wave condenser (C-1), one end of which is connected to earth at (E), are used to vary the time period of oscillation of the antenna circuit and their functions will be described in detail in lessons which are to follow.

With this outline in mind the student will be able to build up a more
