

A Woman Lion Tamer.

It is not often that the taming and training of ferocious beasts is adopted as a pastime.

It is not often that such an occupation would appeal to a woman as a means of diversion. Yet one of the most successful lion tamers in Germany is Miss Cora Bennett of Leipzig, who adopted this occupation as a source of entertainment rather than of income.

Miss Bennett is of German extraction and was carefully educated. Her parents died while she was in her teens, and after their death she resided in the family of one of her father's friends, the director of the Leipzig Zoological Gardens.

She had many opportunities to study the animals in the Leipzig collection. Being a young woman of independent mind she was at length told the notion that she would like to try her hand at training a pair of young lions that had just arrived at the zoo.

At first her friends refused to take the project seriously. When they were convinced that she was in earnest they tried to dissuade her, pointing out the difficulty and danger of such an undertaking.

Miss Bennett was convinced that she had a natural gift for the work, and moreover that she understood the nature of lions as well as most persons. She succeeded in taming her own way and was permitted to take charge of the young lions.

"I cannot say truthfully that in the least nervous when I entered the menagerie for the first time," said Miss Bennett in relating her experience.

"I had studied the habits and nature of such animals and had seen the methods of the trainers. I had theories of my own on the subject, and I know that the one thing necessary was to gain and keep the mastery from the start."

When I entered the cage they retreated to the opposite corner and crouched there in fear and trembling. I found that this was due to the rustling of my long skirts which seemed to inspire in them a sort of fascinated fear.

"I had noticed that the sight and sound of my skirts had a peculiar effect on other lions that it did in this first pair. I think that the reason is this, lions that are captured in a wild state do not see or come in contact with women until after they have come into captivity."

"I have never had an accident or an injury from the lions beyond a few scratches on my hands and arms which I inflicted usually by accident. That is because I am always careful. I take my time in teaching subjects and always know them thoroughly before I attempt to make them perform any tricks."

"I enjoy my work. That is why I took it up. To succeed in it requires hard work and careful attention and above all infinite patience. But in the nature of things I see no reason why a woman who has strong nerves and is thoroughly self-reliant should not become as successful in lion taming as a man."

"I am not vain that I have been able to do this. I am not vain that I have been able to do this. I am not vain that I have been able to do this. I am not vain that I have been able to do this."

"I am not vain that I have been able to do this. I am not vain that I have been able to do this. I am not vain that I have been able to do this. I am not vain that I have been able to do this."

Vivian Neslie was standing in the driveway of the manor, near a cluster of gladioli, that formed a picture in themselves, all crimson and gold, like a woman's hair, but with the leaves hovering round them.

She looked at the gladioli, and still held one in her hands. There was no finer spot in England than this manor garden, and this house of Lancelwood stood with thoughtful face and dramatic eyes.

Perhaps,

"Perhaps," said the young secretary, with a meaning look that any one who had been in the office of "Sir Arthur" would have understood.

"Sir Arthur may have fallen in love, as others do," she repeated, scornfully. "Pray, pardon me, Mr. Dorman, but I am not of my own father's falling in love."

"There was an interval of uncomfortable silence, broken by the young secretary, who said: "I am sorry, Miss Neslie, to bring disagreeable matters before you, but Sir Arthur says he wishes to see you."

"I must go," she said, with a sigh. "I must go to see Sir Arthur. I am not of my own father's falling in love."
