The Game of Life and Death

By LINCOLN COLWOOD.

There aren't any more of those evening gatherings under the awning in Hong Kong—the kind that Nicholas used to like so well. For that matter, Nicholas is gone too, but I still always remember him in connection with those interesting and friendly times, Hong Kong wouldn't have seemed natural without him. We grew to look for his little bark each trip, and more than often she would be lying in the harbor close under the water-line, a small vessel painted in the most extraordinary colors, cream-white above and below-green below the water-line with a good deal of bright yellow on the woodwork about decks. Her houses and masts were painted yellow, if I remember.

The last time I saw him was on the quarter-deck of the Omega the night before the big typhoon of 1907 in Hong Kong. He was hanging some lanterns beneath the awning as I sat up the gangway, for he expected the captains of the fleet on board to bid him good-by. Something about the man always hit me between the eyes. His experience in the China coastwise trade had been remarkable. A certain light about his eyes, and his outlook on life was strange and original; and among men he had the reputation of knowing what he done. Chinese dialects and understanding matters beyond the yellow and impenetrable border of the land.

Together we sat by the rail and watched the sampans gather from the other ships. A puff of breeze offshore lifted the awning for a moment, and rustled among the paper gulls. The quiet harbor lay like a pool at the foot of the Peter and above it the sky seemed closing in.

He didn't sail the next day as he had planned; he was waiting to see if there was trouble outside. Now and then we could catch ourselves listening anxiously to the news of the typhoon, and talk turned to typhoons of the past, and Nicholas told us the story of a strange experience he had had when he was only on such another clouded and mysterious night when men become the people of a dream.

"I wouldn't ask you to believe this," Nicholas said. "If I could refer you to any of the next time I was in the harbor, he was probably chartered most of you for home in his time; and whether you think so or not, he is the soul of honor, and would back me up in every detail of this yarn. Perhaps he'll talk to you the next time I see him about his ability at poker; but really you never could comprehend his grasp of the game, and his ability at it, unless you had seen him as I have, playing it with his life in his hands. He's every next time as I was in the harbor, he was probably chartered most of you for home in his time; and whether you think so or not, he is the soul of honor, and would back me up in every detail of this yarn. Perhaps he'll talk to you the next time I see him about his ability at poker; but really you never could comprehend his grasp of the game, and his ability at it, unless you had seen him as I have, playing it with his life in his hands.
