The executors, hishop Casey and Very Rev. Monsignor Connolly, argued that there was no intestacy, as it was the express desire of the bishop not only to straighten out and make clear the titles to certain properties owned by the church, but also to leave to the church Judge Barker said it is claimed by the plaintiffs that the bishop's sole intention in making this will was to remedy some properties standing on the records in his individual name, but which really were individual name, but which really were church properties and should have been legally as well as beneficially vested in the bishop in his corporate name, The Roman Catholic Bishop of St. John; and that as to his own individual real estate there was a total intestacy and as to his per-sonal estate a partial intestacy, in which case the whole of the real and the undissonal estate a partial intestacy, in case the whole of the real and the undisposed portion of personal property would go to Mrs. Travers as the sole next of kin. After setting out the will and referring to the properties that stood on the record in the bishop's personal name the judge took in the Union street property; left by John Sweeny, father of the late bishop, I the arrangements between the arrangements between the arrangements between the duplet of pledge cards has set forther the work of the work

What that reason really is he does not clearly tell us and even if extrinsic evidence were admissible even if extrinsic evidence were admissible for the purpose I am unable to say, and I think it the merest conjecture to attempt to say precisely what was operating in the bishop's mind when he wrote the words he did. What was the want or mistake he proposed to meet? I admit I have no very well defined ideas on the which and the expressions of course!

subject and the suggestions of counsel, varied as they were, only go to prove how uncertain and unreliable any conclusion on the subject must be. One thing, how ever, is certain, that whatever the want was, or whatever the mistake was which the bishop had in his mind, he intended to supply the want and meet the mistake by giving and devising and bequeathing all his estate, real and personal, where-ever situated, to the Roman Catholic Bishop of St. John. That was his remedy Bishop of St. John. That was his remedy, and I am unable to see upon what principle this court should supply an altogether different one. Neither am I able to see upon any rule of construction applicable to wills why the clear and unambiguous language of this devise should be limited to these church properties even if it were capable of clear demonstration that it was to them the bishop referred in the first part of the sentence." After quoting a number of authorities, Judge Barker said: "There has always been the strongest disinclination on the part of strongest disinclination on the part courts so to construe wills as to leave some portion of the testator's property undisposed of. The assumption is that it a will has been made the testator intended thereby to dispose of all his property not a part of it." Legal opinions were quoted in support of this contention, and the judge said: "I am asked to conclude that because two or three church proper ties in St. John stood in the bishop's making this will was to remedy that de feet and confine its operation exclusively to that description of property and to die intestate as to his own. Now, leaving out of the question the evidence of intention to be derived from the language of the will itself, is it by any means a clear in-ference that when the bishop spoke of a want and a defect which he desired to meet he had these and such like proper-ties and nothing else in his mind? I think not. In the first place, he is not in St. John, but of those in the whole province. More than this, the bishop himself says these properties were then vested—are now and should be vested are his words—in the episcopal corporation. If that were true, there was no such defect to remedy as that suggested. If that were to remedy as that suggested. If that were not true, but the bishop thought it was-as I have a right to assume from the language he used—then he can scarcely be fixed with an intention to remedy a defect or meet a want which in his mind did not exist. More especially he has not used language in his will which he must have known was inappropriate and altogether too comprehensive merely to carry into effect an intention so pracisa carry into effect an intention so precise and special in its character." Again, the

And if you conjecture that the reasons which operated in the bishop's mind for making the devise in no way required a remedy such as he himself provided, that seems to me altogether immaterial, as indicating an intention directly at a variance with that which his own language, renned by him. which his own language, penned by him-self, plainly indicates. There will there-fore be a declaration that the plaintiff, Mrs. Travers, is not entitled as next of kin, as she claims, but that all the testator's propenty, real and personal, is disposed of by the will.
