After reading an American college newspaper that for some reason I receive, I am left wondering about the mentality of the average American college student. One of the ads placed in this newspaper by a cigaret manufacturer shows that the thinking fellow smokes their brand

The ad is in the form of a comic strip, which is highly descriptive of its content. The situation is this: as two members of the ski patrol are returning to their headquarters in the teeth of a howling blizzard they find their way barred by a gully which is overhung by a ledge of snow. This snow would "avalanche" at the slightest provocation. Complicating this is the fact that they could not trek around the obstacle before nightfall. Tough situation.

One of the pair is a thinking fellow, however. He realizes that the snow pus. is balanced perfectly, and the slightest noise would cause it to descend and fill the gully. If the gully were filled, they could cross it in safety. Thus, because he thinks, he can turn this hazard to advantage. He yahoos. An avalanche fills the gully.

The other fellow comments, "That just goes to show you that you can't stop a man who thinks for himself.' Then the first pulls out a package of the manufacturer's cigarets and offers one to his companion, who says, I see by your brand that you think for yourself about cigarets, too."

Students who are active on campus become more mature in business matters because they have more responsibilities, the Daily adds. Many students get into activities simply because they are needed to fill posts that the permanent staffs handle at American Universities.
