It is not valid for some time, will undergo treat surprising, therefore, that fish should be looked to as a substitute. As a food it is meat, although the proportions of nutri-tive elements such as protein, albumen and fat differ considerably. Heretofore, fish has not been a popular article of diet in Canada. The reasons for this are various and some of them must be removed before fish eating can become a national habit. In the first piace, fresh sea fish in prime condition has been almost unobtainable even at points not far removed from the coasts This has been due, frequently, to inefficient by the distributing agencies. It has also been due to unsatisfactory transportation difficulties are not insurmountable, and some of them are already being overcome Education of fishermen and others who handle fish is a necessity that cannot be much longer overlooked. Traditional methods of handling must give way t ore scientific and efficient practices. Such changes would mean increased proof food which have hitherto been wasted, would improve the quality and lower the price to the consumer. Transportation is already being improved and, in time, it, fast train services should, and probably will, be established from the fishing ports
