He did not like to travel along the same lines of argument as those laid down by Mr Garrow, for he had so ably and exhaustively dealt with the Provincial issues that there was no necessity, he claimed, for him to go over the same ground. In a few brief remarks Mr Cameron drew comparisons between the Dominion and Provincial governments, showing how one was extravagant and the other economical, how one legislated in the press, was in our neighborhood saying interests of class and the other in the interests of the people, and warmly endorsed the candidature of Mr Garrow. To the claim set up by Mr Roberts, that he was an Equal Rights candidate, Mr Cameron humorously alluded to the men who had brought Mr Roberts out, naming them as men who were Conservatives first, last, and always.

A number of Conservatives were in the audience, and the meeting broke up with three cheers for Oliver Mowat, good order having been maintained throughout. Mr Garrow's speech in par-ticular made a very favorable impression on the audience. Being a comparative stranger here, there was, naturally, some interest in knowing what kind of speaker he was, and the universally expressed opinion was that he had greatly exceeded their anticipations. No intel-ligent man could listen to Mr Garrow without being convinced of the honesty of his arguments, his evident fairness in discussion, his courteous and honorable treatment of his opponents and his man-ly, straightforward presentation of his ly, straightforward presentation of his platform, and the majority of those who listened to him were fully convinced that he will make an excellent representative for the West Riding of Huron.
