The Adopted Daughter.

CHAPTER XXXIII.
BY MARY ANN MARSH.

As their comrades announced the return of the brigades, the brigades who had collected in the courtyard of the castle, the Frenchman alone remained in the courtyard.

"Barb is telling the captain about your strange recovery," said the woman, standing in the doorway between the two courts. "You fall asleep, and then you wake up, and then you fall asleep again. Perhaps the captain will be surprised to see you."

"The captain was thoughtful and silent," said the woman. "He was thinking of the captain's death."

In a few minutes more one of the brigades appeared in the courtyard, stating that his chief desired to see the ladies without delay.

The Frenchman clasped the baronet's hand as he went to obey the summons, and expressed a hope that the interview would result favorably to him, and to then take the guide lead the way.

He was conducted through the outer courtyard—where the whole band regarded him curiously, his sudden recovery looking to them like a miracle—to the farther end of the courtyard, where a narrow passage branched off to the right.

In order to make the captain's apartment as quiet and retired as possible, a door had been fitted with a small rise and a handle, which could be turned by a key, and which opened into the courtyard.

After giving the baronet a few directions, the guide returned to the outer courtyard. The baronet then opened the door, and entered the apartment.

Sir John looked at the baronet with a surprised expression, and then he turned to the baronet's wife, and said, "You are looking very well."

"I am looking very well," said the baronet. "I have been thinking of you very much, and I have been hoping to see you very soon."

"I have been thinking of you very much," said the baronet's wife. "I have been hoping to see you very soon."

"I have been thinking of you very much," said the baronet. "I have been hoping to see you very soon."

"I have been thinking of you very much," said the baronet's wife. "I have been hoping to see you very soon."

which I have gathered from different sources. The baronet was surprised, and concluding, since the brigades seemed to have been so much about him already, that he was not to be surprised, he said, "Very well, I am ready to tell you about my family. It is very small, consisting of my son and an adopted daughter. They were well educated about sixteen years ago. I have been thinking of you very much."

"I have been thinking of you very much," said the baronet. "I have been hoping to see you very soon."

CHAPTER XXXIV.
THE INKPEPPER'S NEWS.

What excellent emotions thrilled the heart of Sir John Courtney as he found himself beneath the sunshine of heaven and with the fresh air fanning his brow.

Although his year of captivity was as if it had not been, the very air he breathed seemed strange to him, and the breeze that sighed among the trees had an unfamiliar sound.

His almost dumb, as he caught sight of his rugged clothing, and the long gray beard that lay upon his breast, he felt that it was indeed himself who was walking amid those strange scenes, or rather that he was a stranger.

He was not alone, however, for he was surrounded by a crowd of people, who were looking at him with curiosity and interest.

When he had recovered his senses, and when he had become somewhat used to his personal appearance, he reflected upon the excitement which had been made by his arrival.

He was getting ready, I'll tell you all the news. He withdrew, countermanded the order for the vehicle which Sir John had ordered, gave directions for a dinner suitable for his distinguished guest, and then returned to the parlor with a calm and collected manner.

"When did you say this wedding was to be?" asked the baronet. "I don't know the day, Sir John," said the baronet's wife. "I have been hoping to see you very soon."
