

discussion, from the Salvation Army to the Confession of Faith. Some of the fathers of the church would lift their hands in holy horror could they but have heard the fierce onslaught made by reckless innovators on the bulwarks of our faith. There are still, however, a few choice spirits left among us, who stand by the traditions and beliefs of the mighty past. These have resolved to prefer charges of heresy against the more prominent leaders of heterodoxy, at a future meeting of the Pine Hill presbytery, into which the students have decided to constitute themselves. We feel confident that the church at large will await with eager expectation the decision of this most momentous case.

The discussions have been characterized, so far, by vigour and that persistent dogmatism for which student debates are especially famed. Debating societies have been at all times a fruitful school of oratory, and we believe that from ours also will go forth those who will electrify the world by the truth and cogency of their arguments, and the irresistible power of their eloquence.
