WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1916.

THE VALUE OF AN EDITORIAL.

A few days ago we had occasion to notice an editorial in The Canadian, the weekly paper issued by the Ontario School for the Deaf of this city, in which sensational charges were made in regard to the alleged untruthfulness and unreliability of newspapers.

Five-tenths of the news department of the daily papers was described as "pure invention' and four tenths as "conjecture and surmise."

By "pure invention," of course, our contemporary means deliberate falsehood. This statement or insinuation is so utterly wild as to be undeserving of serious treatment. We pay passing attention to it merely because it illustrates an extravagant and unreasonable method of criticising what is after all a miracle of truth and accuracy—the modern daily newspaper.

When you consider the lightning speed with which a paper gathers its daily harvest, not only from its own town or city, but from every corner of the globe, it would be amazing if accuracies did not sometimes appear. That the inaccuracies are numerous or frequently deliberate is altogether aside from the fact. The paper appears a twentieth-century marvel of exact information.

The reports from the European war are, however, exceptional. The Ontario pays for the best service obtainable, and these reports have all been duly censored by the officials of the British War Office. It is unfortunately true that in the despatches "conjecture and surmise" have frequently appeared, not to speak of "pure invention."

But in regard to war news let us be fair. The publisher of a newspaper cannot go to the capitals of Europe every day to verify the statements that are sent out. He gives them to his readers just as he receives them If the statements are unreliable or false the publisher is not

And when we consider the case of the governments who send out or permit to be sent out the various reports, let us not forget that the countries are at war. The time is also exceptional. To send out accurate data in regard to all the movements and proceedings at the front would be only to disclose valuable information to the enemy. No government is insane enough to do that.

We claim no responsibility for the character of the reports from the seat of war. That is the affair of the British War Office. People will have to be their own judges in regard to the truthfulness of the news given out. For our own part we consider that we have received a marvellous amount of very correct information in regard to the situation in Europe. We believe that the most of us who follow the despatches have a reasonably accurate idea of just how matters stand at the present time. Even from the war theatre it will be found that the misinformation sent abroad is surprisingly small in volume as compared with what is known to be true

The newspaper press not only adheres to the truth as a matter of policy, but it renders a great public service in the correction of false rumors and reports. This has been illustrated on many occasions since the war started. Time and again wild stories have in some mysterious manner gone abroad and been given very general circulation on the streets. Sometimes these took the form of casualties to our local boys sometimes the rumors were of great battles. The appearance of the papers served to show that the tales had no foundation in fact.

While The Ontario claims no responsibility for the truthfulness or the reverse of the war despatches, we do admit full responsibility for the local news. In the matter of local news we challenge anybody to show that we publish Boost your city, boost your friend. "pure inventions" or deliberately false state- Boost the lodge that you attend. ments. The daily newspaper is an almost indispensable necessity to every man and woman who can read. It is indispensable to the business man and to the professional man, and most workingmen would rather go without their supper than their evening paper, and the women folks would be "lost" without it. Were the daily newspapers to suspend publication for a week there would be confusion and something like a panic in consequence. We would miss the news of the day, including the war news, and we would be as it were groping around in the dark as to what was happening in the world around us. We would be thrown back a hundred years.

The daily press is not only a disseminator of news, and of information generally, but it is a public record of the proceedings of many public bodies, such as Parliament, Civic Councils and such like, and in this way keeps the public posted as to the doings of their representatives, a work which coull hardly be done by any other means. Every morning or evening the newspaper reader can sit in judgment on the men he has placed in power to transact his public business. In this way the newspaper becomes the guardian of the man who reads it. He depends upon it to keep him informed as to what is being done in all the activities of public life, and from the reports he receives through his newspaper he is able to judge the actions of public men.

But the average daily newspaper is something more. It aspires to be a moulder of public opinion. It discusses all sorts of public questions, and points out for the benefit and edification of the reader what it considers the right side of these questions. The newspaper editorials act as guide, philosopher and friend to those who read them. But there are some men who say that they place little confidence in newspaper editorials because the opinions expressed therein are only the opinions of one man-the edi-

Suppose we grant that. The opinion of the lawyer is only the opinion of one man, so with the opinion of the physician and the theologian. But the layman would not ignore or belittle the opinion of any of these men because it happened to be the opinion of one man. Similarly the opinion of the editor should not be thrown aside as of no account because it is only his opinion. His is as much a trained intellect as that of men of any other of the professions. He must at least be a student of political economy—the so-called dismal science—and he must be a close student of all public questions as they arise.

But it is scarcely true to say that an editorial is only the opinion of one man. It may have been written by one man. But the cpinions expressed therein may have been the crystallization of the thoughts of many men. The editor when he is not writing is imbibing the views of other men, other editors, magazine writers, statesmen, and so forth. He gathers facts, data, and information, and analyses principles, and after careful thought he expresses the conclusions he has come to in his editorial. Thus an editorial is the work of many men and of many minds.

We may be told that editors are no more infallible than are other men-that they differ on political and other questions and cannot be depended upon. True, they differ. Who do not? The doctor, the lawyer and the theologian differ and business men differ in their modes of business just as men differ in thought. But that need not be an argument against the editorial because it is written by one man. Uniformity would mean stagnation—death. The reader cannot discard the editorial because it is one man's production, without discarding the advice of his lawyer, doctor and minister. The average man has neither the facilities nor the time for arriving at an intelligent appreciation of the many questions that arise from day to day outside of the daily newspaper, and that is why so many men practically accept the opinions of their particular newspaper as their own opinions.
