In these busy days at The Observer office much interesting matter has to be left out. Contrary to the idea held by most people, editors do not have to "hunt up something to fill up with." Their most arduous task is selecting what the available space will hold from a mass of contributions that come each week. As early as Monday evening The Observer was confronted with sufficient material—all of it good, and well written—to fill more than 100 columns while the space at his disposal for any week is no more than 18 columns, the capacity limit of our three trained compositors. Of course these young ladies could set twice as much type but there are other duties just as pressing which they must perform.
