

REPLY TO "YOU KNOW YOU DO!"

By Mrs. O. L. Sprague, Lawrence, Mass., U.S.
I cannot help the tall-tale blood
From stealing to my cheek,
Whenever I hear his well-known step
My heart will give a leap.
I know it does!
I cannot help but read the glance,
When eyes with tender love seek mine,
I answer back the mute appeal,
Though you don't comprehend the sign.
I know he does!
If he "ignores" my pa for me,
I do not think it "very wrong."
When love inspires my happy soul,
I sing my happiest song.
I know I do!
Though he may speak of "Kate and Jennie,"
The "hateful" things I do not care;
I only flirt and tease the more,
A woman knows if she is fair.
I know I do!
What if I give a "smother'd" scream,
Whenever his arm is "round my chair?"
It gives me such a sudden thrill,
Because I like to have it there.
I know I do!
I nestle closer to his side,
For love attracts me there,
And then it is my rightful place,
Because he wants me there.
I know he does!
He presses kisses on my cheek,
My lips meet his half-way,
And then most manfully he speaks,
The words he's longed to say.
I know he has!
I need not tell you what he said,
For that is private what he said,
Thought't made my heart beat just as fast,
As any, any trip hammer.
I know it did!
I am the happiest girl alive,
I wonder what papa will say:
"Will he," "Oh, take her Jim,
The mix would always have her way."
(I know she did!)
My dear papa, I love him best
Of all the world save Jim,
Oh, dear! I wish that all the girls
Could such a treasure win as Jim.
I do!

HELENA GRAHAM,
—OR—
THE BRIDE'S SACRIFICE.

CHAPTER IX.
Captain Malcolm Graham sat in the parlor of the Craig's End Hotel, as the flaming gilt sign-board announced, his heels elevated on the window-sill, his chair tipped sublimely back, a cigar in his mouth, and a newspaper in his hand.
Many people were passing in and out,
some of whom he greeted with a nod, others with a brief salutation, while he still went on with his reading and smoking. There seemed to be nothing very exciting in the paper, judging by Captain Graham's suppressed yawns; and he was about to throw it aside as worthless, when a paragraph caught his eye, that brought him to his feet as suddenly as though those members were furnished with steel springs.
The paragraph was brief, and ran thus:—
"If Oscar Graham, Esq., of Graham Isle, be still alive, he is earnestly requested to call immediately at the office of H.
Preston, Writer to the Signet, No. 12, Fore-street, Craig's End. In case of his death his heirs should apply. H. PRESTON."
"Now, what in the name of Neptune and all his scaly court, can this mean?"
 ejaculated the amazed Captain Graham.
"Should be happy to inform you," said a voice behind him, "only I don't happen to know what you're talking about."
Captain Graham turned round, and saw a fashionably-dressed young man who had just entered standing beside him.
"Ah, Murray, how are you?" he said,
extending his hand; "happy to see you.
What in the world brought you here?
The very last person ever expected to see in this quarter of the globe."
"Well," said Murray, leisurely seating himself, "I came down here, nominally, to transact some business for the governor;
but the fact is, I heard the Summer Breeze had arrived, and I wanted to pay my devotions to your lovely sister. How is pretty lady Helena?"
"Very well, and at present on a visit at the Rev. Mr. Malcolm's. But look at this advertisement, here, in the Craig's End Chronicle. What the deuce do you make of it?"
Murray took the paper and carelessly glanced over the lines.
"Faith, I don't know. Somebody's left you a legacy, perhaps."
"Pooh! what a notion! Who under the sun is there to leave a legacy to me?
The Grahams are all as poor as Job's turkey."
"Well, there's your mother's relations
—the Dundases. Old Edward Dundas, the City banker, is a millionaire, worth more hundred thousand pounds than I would undertake to count. He might have died and left you his money."
"And leave his own family without.
A likely story," said Captain Graham.
"My dear fellow, he had no family, except a wife, and she has been dead for many years. You may be certain he has left you his heir."
"By Jove! if that should prove to be true, that would be a slice of good luck.
But it cannot be. Dame Fortune would never bestow on a Graham any such friendly smile. They always were an impoorished race, and always will be, I believe."
"Don't be too confident. Strange things happen sometimes. For instance, I saw something strange a night or two ago."
"Yes? What is it?"
