A Lover's GERALDINE. Romance.

Captain Morrison, drawn down by the fall of the dead man, rose with dif-ficulty and groped his way with slow Eteps to the bell; but before he touched the handle the door opened and James Otway came in. He had remained within hearing, having reanon to mistrust his namesake's lovalty. 'Captain Morrison, he has hurt you -I know." he began, and then stopped short, horror-struck at the sight of the dead man on the floor at his feet. "It was—an accident!" gasped the other, in a weak, hoarse voice, as he reeled against an armchair, and James helped him to place himself in it. "The sight makes me faint. Will you send Johnson to take—him away—upstairs to his father's room? Don't let my wife know anything—yet."

CHAPTER XL.

A few minutes later the three ladies and Lindley, who were in the drawingroom together, heard sounds in the hall and low voices which alarmed them. Geraldine started up and rushed to the door; but it had been locked on the outside. She could hear the sounds proceeding through the hall and up the staircase, and she recognized them as of the same kind as those she had heard the night before, when her husband was brought home. Without uttering a cry she ran across the room to the French window, opened it, and hurried to the nearest of the two library windows. Her husband was leaning back in the armchair by the fireplace, and Johnson was by his side. She tapped sharply on the glass, and the butler, at a gesture from his master, crossed the room, opened the window and then left the library. But the expression on her husband's face did not change as Geraldine hurried toward him and knelt down by his He still stared in front of him with dull, glassy eyes, and said, with

He laughed harshly. Wait till you hear what I have done. I have killed James Otway!"
As he had expected, there was only one James Otway for her. She shud-dered from head to foot; but her fingers, though they trembled on his arm, id not relax their clasp.

"Well?" said he, harshly.
"Well?" she echoed, faintly. "Have you forgotten the devotion for him that you were always flinging in my face, your bitter words and threats if I should dare to touch a hair of

"Philip, Philip, I am sorry-you must forget them! You are hiding something from me: you did not mean to do it—I am sure of that. I have learned to trust you; trust me, too, and tell me what you mean."
He tried to speak, but could not; she felt that he was trembling violently, and she saw the old fire rekindle in his eyes. After a minute's silence, he

You are right; it was an accident. But I cannot prove it. We were alone together; and I shall have to fly from 'Will you? When."

'Where shall we go?" she whispered, starting to her feet.
"'We' go?" he echoed, with a flame springing up in his dark eyes. "Yes, yes, I will go with you, of course; and I will nurse you and devote myself to you, and try to make you forget," said she, hurriedly. "Do you mean it?" he asked, looking steadily up in her face.
