"The moment he comes in, see that he gets my card."

Again there was delay. The general, consumed by impatience, crossed and recrossed the room. Elizabeth stood by the window, one hand parting the heavy curtains. The day had been wasted, and the hours that remained to them were perilously few. But more than the thought of North's death, the death itself filled her mind with unspeakable imaginings. The power to control her thoughts was lost, and her terrors took her where they would, until North's very death struggles became a blinding horror. Somewhere in the silent house a door opened and shut. "At last!" said the general, under his codor of new wood; a thing men had "The moment he comes in, see that he the silent house a door opened and shut.

"At last!" said the general, under his breath.

But it was only the governor's secretary who entered the room. He halted in the doorway and glanced from father to daughter. There was no mistaking the look on his face.

"How much longer are we to be kept in doubt?" asked General Herbert, in a voice that indicated both his dread and his sense of insult.

"The governor deeply regrets that there should have been this delay——" began the secretary.

"He is ready to see us now?" General Herbert interrupted.

cination in the gaunt thing that gave out he odor of new wood; a thing men had made with their own hands; a clumsy device to inflict a brutal death; a left-over from barbarism which denied every claim of civilization and Christianity! Now, as the moon crept up from behind the distant hills, the black shadows retreated, and as he watched, timber by timber the gallows stood forth distinct in the soft clear light. In a few hours, unless the governor interfered, he would pass through the door directly below his window. He pictured the group of grave-faced nervous officials, he saw himself bound and blindfolded and helpless in their midst.

Herbert interrupted.

"I regret—"

"What do you regret? Do you mean to tell me that he will not see us?" demanded the general.

"The governor has left town."

The angry color flamed into the old man's cheeks. His sorely tried patience was on the point of giving way, but a cry from the window recalled him.

"Where has he gone?"

"He left for the East at four o'clock," faltered the secretary, after a moment of wretched irresolution.

The general's face became white as his inger yielded to a more powerful emotion.

The general's hope revived as he heard this. He stepped to Elizabeth's side and rested his hand protectingly on her shoulder. "You have the governor's decision?"

"Yes," answered the secretary unsteadily. steadily.
There was a moment's silence.

"My God!" cried her father, as Elizabeth's groping hands clung to him. He felt the shudder that wrenched her slim body. "Be brave!" he whispered, slipping his arms about her.
"Oh, father, father!" she sobbed.
"We will go home," said the general. He looked up from the bowed head that rested against his shoulder, expecting to find the secretary still standing by the door, but that dapper young man had

"We have failed. Do you think it would have been different if Judge Belknap had not been called away?"

General Herbert shook his head.

"And now we must go back to him! We were to have telegraphed him; we won't now, will we?"

"My poor, poor Elizabeth!" cried the general brokenly.

"How shall we ever tell him!"

"I will go alone," said the general.

"No, no! I must see him! You are sure we have time to cateh our train—if we should miss it——" And the thought gave her a sudden feverish energy.

"You need not hurry," her father assured her. But look at your watch!" she en-

"We have half an hour," he said.

"We have half an hour," he said.
"You can think of nothing more to do?"
she asked, after another brief silence.
"Nothing, dear."

Little was said until they boarded the train, but in the drawing-room of the Pullman which her father had been able to secure, Elizabeth's restraint forsook her, and she abandoned herself to despair. Her father silently took his place at her side. Oppressed and preoccupied, the sting of defeat unmitigated, he was struggling with the problem of the future. The morrow with its hideous tragedy seemed both the end and the beginning. One thing was clear to him, they must god away from Idle Hour, where North had been so much a part of Elizabeth's life. Nothing had been added to this decision when at length the train pulled in to Mount Hope.

"Without, In the Corridot, an occasional whispered word passed between General Herbert and the deputy.
"The governor could do nothing, John," Elizabeth faltered at last.

"I understand, dear," he said tenderly. "He would not even see us; we went repeatedly to his house and to the capitol, and in the end we saw his secretary. The governor had left town; he never intended to see us! To reach this end—when nothing can be done—" Her eyes grew wide with horror.

"No, no, I must stay till morning, until the day breaks—don't send me away, John!" she entreated.

"It will be easier—"
