the work of establishing the Church. Money they have not to bestow. But materials for building, and labour in erecting churches, and parsonages, and schools, and in clearing a glebe for their Minister, they rejoice to afford, and welcome the task with thankfulness.

Under these circumstances, when they are once made known, it is impossible to doubt that the liberality and Christian piety of individuals will seek to compensate, in some degree, the funds of the Society for the deprivation of the Government Grant; and thus it may be that the failure of that supply shall eventually become a blessing to the Colonial Church, by rousing the attention of their brethren at home to the situation of a people sprung from the same blood, worshipping in the same tongue, nursed in the same faith, and zealously attached to the same pure doctrine and primitive discipline, which has rendered the Church of England so long the Pillar and Ground of the Truth.
