At the end of the first half-year of its existence, THE BYSTANDER finds its circulation treble of that on which its founders calculated, and still increasing. We do not take this as a proof of agreement with our opinions, but we hope we may take it as a proof that independent journalism is in favour, and that THE BYSTANDER is believed to be independent.

"The attention of intelligent observers will be drawn to Canada afresh by the promise of a modest little periodical, the first No. of which has just been issued at Toronto, and which is felicitously called The Bystander. It is devoted to comments upon 'Current Events, Canadian and General,' and shows The Bystander to be a singularly sagacious and well-informed observer, watching events with a thoroughly trained eye, and recording his comments with a firm, vigorous, and practical hand. Indeed, The Bystander contains some of the maturest and most admirable political criticism that the English press, daily or weekly, offers."—Harper's Weekly.

"The impartial opinion of one who looks upon our affairs with the disinterested yet kindly eye of a well-wisher who is outside of our circle, and personally unaffected by our successes or our failures, our vices or our virtues, ought to be of value. . . . A free-lance in politics can do useful work . . . whether Bystander talks of home or foreign affairs; whether he fights against party or advocates independence, or slashes at the Tory Government of Britain; whether he mildly hints at Sir John's "equivocating and disquieting language" on the Pacific Scandal, or slaps at Austria as "the Tory turnkey in the jail of oppressed and struggling nationalities," or pictures the showily-attired politician whose loud-patterned vests and gaudy jewellery of a generation ago have been translated in the Jingo policy of Great Britain that dazzles weak intellects; in whatever department of criticism the Bystander's remarks are worth reading, and often worth heeding."—London Advertiser.

"An examination of the contents of the first numbers shows that the magazine is edited with a vigour, ability, research, and extended information, that promise to make The Bystander an important auxiliary in diffusing an improved tone and sentiment in regard to the more important topics of the day."—Detroit Free Press.

"We like the idea of the publication of The Bystander, as the exponent of the independent views of one who has the power and the leisure to think out public questions, and the faculty of clothing his reflections in attractive language."

"The March No. of The Bystander is the raciest of the series thus far, and full of interest and practical thought. The Editor hits right out from the shoulder when addressing himself to questions affecting the Dominion, no matter which party gets hurt; and this is the kind of independence we admire."

"Turning from the miserable wrangle and slavish commendations of the party press, the new candidate for public favour (The Bystander) is an encouraging sign of the times, with its broad views and refreshing independence."—Irish Canadian.
