Canada has an equal status with the other British nations within the empire and in the league of nations. But, says Col. Amery, this question of equal national status is not the first thing after all.

Equal participation in carrying out the development and governance of the less advanced territories under our flag seems to me of far more practical importance than the equality of status in ininternational affairs, the full recognition of which has come with the war. * * It is of less consequence to the dominions than securing equal participation in the development of imperial trade and territory. To have an equal say in the destiny of the African territories under the British flag is of more moment than to have an equal say in the fate of Fiume or Galicia. It should be the aim of the imperial policy of the future encourage all the dominions to take an active interest in the tropical empire. It is theirs as much as ours. * * Every part of the empire must look upon it as theirs, just as much as England's, as an instrument fashioned to their hands * * * for playing their part in settling the destinies of the world in peace or in war.

Honestly paraphrased, what does this mean? You cannot dissociate the colonial office from the admiralty. Col. Amery is not a haphazard talker. THE GIFT PROBLEM SOLVED

MANY of our customers who have opened Savings Accounts for their children have been agreeably surprised at the way these accounts have grown. Such accounts make ideal Christmas Gifts, and in fact we do not know of any gift likely to have such a far-reaching influence on the character of the recipient as a Savings Account. We have found from experience that children having deposit accounts take the deepest interest in adding to their savings and many such accounts increase in the course of time to large proportions.

Perhaps they would believe she had deserted Harry, when they found she was living with her parents and Harry was still in the country. In that case they might imagine Harry was going about with this other woman out of pique.

Either idea worried her. And the fact remained that only a few nights after she had left him, Harry was sufficiently consoled to dine with a party at a friyolous restaurant. If thru some fault of hers Harry had left her, Louise felt sure she would not have the heart to dine out with a festive erowd.

So Harry had been dining with another woman! That was the thought which whirled thru her head as Louise sat staring at the fire, after Carol had gone.

"I saw Harry and one woman lunching together this afternoon," her father replied. "That's really why I came up to see you."

"She was quite blonde and rather pretty, wasn't she?" Louise asked."

"Yes, my dear," he said, coming into the room, his overcoat on and some books under his arm.

"Are you going so soon?" she asked in surprise.

"I only ran in to see how you and your mother were getting along, and to take these books to the club. Do you want anything?"

"Yes," Louise answered with a little note of authority in her voice, "I want you to sit down and talk to me. Please do, and tell Anne that you'll be here for dinner."

"Of course, I don't want to imprisen him. Do you think I'm jealous?"

"Aren't you, a'little bit?" This question surprised her by its directness.

"Perhaps," Louise confessed, trying to be quite fair. "Do you think a man dislikes jealousy in a woman?"

"There's nothing he could dislike more, particularly if the jealousy is unfounded."
