U. S. Minister Schenck's jokes are not appreciated in England. Schenck met a son of Ben Holliday some time ago, and afterwards meeting a gentleman named Christmas, he conceived a pun. Said the General: "I think I have met a relative of yours—a Mr. Holliday." "I think not," said Christmas, "I have no relative of that name." Subsequently Schenck told the story at a dinner-party, and the guests each glared at his neighbor and no one saw the joke. At last one noble Lord feebly laughed and said, "Ah! yes, very good, General. Ah, were they—ahrelated, you know?"

displayed a rare talent for combining business with religion. The fair sectarians, for with a few exceptions they were all of the fair sex, dwelt in the Russian town of Porchov, and were called Serahinvski, from their founder, Father Seraphinus. Their creed was implied be lief in their reverend leader, who enjoined upon them the duty of humbling them selves by cutting off their hair close to their hair close to their haad, and then allowing it to grow out again until such time as the spiritual adviser should think it proper to repeat the process. The women were converted in the tresses sacrificed by the devotees. The seraphic doctor was arrested and confessed his crime, mildly protesting, however, that his method of disposing of the hair was no part of his creed, but that he had adopted this plan for the purpose of procuring means with
