

“GEORGINA’S REASONS.”

BY HENRY JAMES.

CHAPTER I.

She was certainly a singular girl, and if he felt as he did he didn't know how to understand her. It is not surprising that he should have felt it at the beginning. But he felt at the beginning what he did not feel at the end, that her singularity took the form of a charm, which—under circumstances had made them so intimate—it was impossible to resist or confound away. He had a strange impression it amounted at times to a positive distress, and shot through the sense of pleasure—morally speaking—with the assurance of a sudden twinge of sensuality that it would be better to each of them that they should break off short and never see each other again.

He had never before seen a girl who looked so young and so old, and he had never before seen a girl who looked so simple and so complex. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a child and so much like a woman. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a stranger and so much like a friend. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a dream and so much like a reality. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a mystery and so much like a revelation. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a puzzle and so much like a solution. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a question and so much like an answer. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a challenge and so much like a triumph. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a test and so much like a victory. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a trial and so much like a success. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a struggle and so much like a conquest. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a battle and so much like a triumph. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a war and so much like a peace. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a storm and so much like a calm. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a fire and so much like a light. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a darkness and so much like a dawn. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a night and so much like a day. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a winter and so much like a summer. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a cold and so much like a heat. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a pain and so much like a pleasure. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a sorrow and so much like a joy. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a grief and so much like a hope. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a despair and so much like a faith. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a doubt and so much like a certainty. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a question and so much like an answer. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a challenge and so much like a triumph. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a test and so much like a victory. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a trial and so much like a success. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a struggle and so much like a conquest. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a battle and so much like a triumph. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a war and so much like a peace. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a storm and so much like a calm. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a fire and so much like a light. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a darkness and so much like a dawn. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a night and so much like a day. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a winter and so much like a summer. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a cold and so much like a heat. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a pain and so much like a pleasure. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a sorrow and so much like a joy. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a grief and so much like a hope. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a despair and so much like a faith. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a doubt and so much like a certainty.

He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a puzzle and so much like a solution. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a question and so much like an answer. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a challenge and so much like a triumph. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a test and so much like a victory. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a trial and so much like a success. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a struggle and so much like a conquest. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a battle and so much like a triumph. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a war and so much like a peace. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a storm and so much like a calm. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a fire and so much like a light. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a darkness and so much like a dawn. He had never before seen a girl who looked so much like a night and so much like a day.
