

"I Heartily Recommend Putnam's Emulsion to All Who Are Suffering From Affections of the Throat and Lungs. And I Am Certain That For Wasting Diseases Nothing Superior To It Can Be Obtained."

"I have been suffering from Pulmonary Diseases for the last five years. About two years ago, during an acute period of my illness, I was advised by my physician to try Putnam's Emulsion. I did so with the most gratifying results. My sufferings were speedily alleviated, my cough diminished, my appetite improved. I added several pounds to my weight in a short time and began to recover strength. This process continued until I felt that I had been a misery to me, became once more a pleasure. Since then Putnam's Emulsion has been my only medicine."

As one who has fully tested its worth, I hereby recommend it to all who are suffering from affections of the Lungs and Throat, and I am certain that for any form of wasting diseases, nothing superior can be obtained."

A gentleman was out shooting near Totnes, England, the other day, when he had the misfortune to shoot his dog. For a moment he was too much overcome to see what damage he had done, and before he recovered himself the animal, a black retriever, had come up to him, bringing in its mouth his own tail, which had been shot clean off.

When Baby was sick, we gave her Castoria.
When she was a Child, she cried for Castoria.
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had Children, she gave them Castoria.

The Kleptomaniac.

Carroll had asked me to invite his brother to Locust Grove, and having made Carroll's wishes my law during the twenty-eight years of his life, I at once wrote to Miss Agnes Lapice, and gave her a cordial invitation to visit me.

She accepted in a graceful, pretty note that pronounced me in her favor, and at the time appointed I drove to the station and met her when the train arrived. As she was the only passenger who got off the car at N—, I had no trouble in finding her, and greeted her affectionately.

She was very, very pretty; pure blonde, with a face like one of Raphael's cherubim, almost babyish in its round outlines, wonderful blue eyes, and short, golden curls. She was very well dressed, and of a noble way, and I wondered greatly at Carroll's choice.

For Carroll, my grandson, orphaned in infancy, had grown to manhood under my care, and was a man grave and rather severe, of stern rectitude, devoted to his profession, that of a lawyer, and the last man in the world I should have expected to fall a victim to a baby face and childlike manner. And yet he loved Agnes Lapice with the first true, strong love of his heart, and saw only perfection in her careless ways.

In less than a week I had ceased to wonder at what I had first thought Carroll's infatuation. Agnes Lapice was, without exception, the most lovable person I ever met in my long life of varied experience. She was 19 years old, and had been most carefully educated, and behind her baby face had a well stocked brain. Her singing was simply perfect for an amateur, and she played well, though her fingers were seldom on the piano keys except to accompany her sweet, pure voice.

One of her great charms was the tender deference she paid to my age, without seeming even to consider me too old for a confidante and companion. We were Carroll only from Saturday afternoon till Monday morning, as Locust Grove was too far from the city for daily trips. But, though Agnes talked often of her betrothal, of the preparations for her approaching wedding, she never seemed to leave me, and I passed hours with our favorite authors, she sang for me, she worked me a gorgeous sofa cushion, and we walked and drove out together.

But, through the charm of her manner, the innocent, careless way she had of doing things, and her expression in her violet eyes that perplexed me. It was not sufficient, I defined to be fear—more like a shadow of fear—and it was brief, passing away like a summer cloud across the sunbeams.

Often she would look her little hands together till the pressure looked as if it must pain her, while in her eyes would come a hungry look, as if she were controlling some violent passion, or was in some thought to have a long talk with her, to offer sympathy and counsel, but in the morning we found her room vacant, the bed undisturbed. She wrote to me soon, telling me she had been to N—, and caught the midnight express, and wrote, "I leave home to-day," she wrote, "and unless I can come back cured, I will come back no more."

In her room I found all the little trinkets I had supposed were in her hands. Carroll and I talked over the matter, and the child he loved, sometimes hopefully, but often, as time wore away, sadly. For my grandson had repeated often of his father's stern judgment, and was willing to think there was really a disease in fault.

"And yet," he would say, with mournful eyes, "if it was kleptomania, that made Agnes take your trinkets, why should we have sent to Sing Sing the burglar who was caught stealing the plate a few years ago? This poor wretch was driven to crime by starvation, but there was no sentimentalism in his law's plea. He was merely a thief and received the punishment of a thief."

"And you would send Agnes to Sing Sing?"
"Heaven forbid! I cannot cease to love her, and pray that she may come back to us as she promised." So two years were away and we thought Agnes was lost to us. Carroll came every week as usual to Locust Grove, and we, and we talked of her betrothal as we talked of the dearly loved dead.

On Saturday afternoon I was in my own room sewing, when a knock upon my door was followed by the entrance of a lady, a little lady, who stood hesitating about entering till I said:
"Agnes, dear child, welcome!" Then she nestled in my arms in the old loving way. But in her face I read the truth I longed to see, that she had overcome her temptation.

The baby look was gone, and the violet eyes, retaining all their sweetness, were full of gentle dignity. The baby manner, too, had vanished in a quiet, ladylike deportment, very graceful and very winsome.
"My dear, dear child," I said, taking off her hat and arranging it, "you are more than welcome."
"You will believe me, then," she said earnestly, "when I tell you that I have conquered my fault, my original inclination. I look back with wonder on my weak temptation that leads me to steal, and which morbid sentiment would ever excuse as an irresistible disease."

I assured her most warmly of my sincere belief in her statement, my deep joy in her triumph. She told me of her struggles and the gradual wearing off of the desire to appropriate the property of others.
"For a year," she said, "I have purposely watched opportunities for theft, for you are the only one that while we were chatting in the drawing room, said, gravely:

"I had a very painful case presented to me this morning. One of our best customers wanted me to defend his daughter, who is the victim of kleptomania."

I felt Agnes, who sat near me, shiver and slip her ice cold hands into mine.
"Perhaps, grandma," continued Carroll, "you do not know that kleptomania is the new name for fashionable theft. We are old-fashioned folks here, and have always called a thief a thief. It is monstrous," he said, his eyes flashing, "to defend stealing because the thief is in high social position."

"But," I said, "they plead the temptation is irresistible."
"So may any thief plead. Supposing I were to walk into a bank and feel an irresistible desire to run away with a few thousand dollars' worth of bank notes. Do you imagine judge or jury would acquit me?"

"But," I urged again, "if you had a dear friend a victim to this disease—if it is a disease—would you judge her to be deserving of the punishment?"
"I would. I could far sooner forgive a poor, starving wretch, who took my purse when driven by want to crime, than I could a thief, who, needing nothing, robbed me, and called it robbery kleptomania."

"But if it were a lady, delicate and refined, you would not send her to share the prison of common felons."
"I would, if she had fitted herself for their society by sharing their crime. I should judge such a case far more severely, for there is no shadow of excuse for it. A poor girl, ignorant and starving, would have far more leniency at my hands than a lady who could so lower herself."

I looked at Agnes. She was pale as death, and in her was a steady, mournful look I had never before seen there.
"Carroll," she said, "if you had a dear friend who was afflicted with kleptomania, how would you advise her to overcome the temptation?"
"Something in the voice of his betrothed moved Carroll deeply, for he replied, with a strange eloquence:
"As all other temptations must be overcome, by constant struggle and fervent prayer."

I thought the time had come for these two to fully understand the painful position, and made some excuse to leave the room.
Not until I heard Carroll go upstairs to his own apartment would I re-enter the drawing room. Agnes was there, the dear, pale, but with a certain womanly expression now to her sweet face.
"I have told him," she said; and her voice sounded hollow and forced. "He will not give me up, but I have persuaded him to leave me all for a long time. I will try to overcome the affliction of my life by struggle and prayer, as Carroll advises. If I conquer I will return; if not, Carroll's wish shall never be a thief."

She rose as she spoke, and kissing me, went to her room. I thought to have a long talk with her, to offer sympathy and counsel, but in the morning we found her room vacant, the bed undisturbed. She wrote to me soon, telling me she had been to N—, and caught the midnight express, and wrote, "I leave home to-day," she wrote, "and unless I can come back cured, I will come back no more."

In her room I found all the little trinkets I had supposed were in her hands. Carroll and I talked over the matter, and the child he loved, sometimes hopefully, but often, as time wore away, sadly. ever detected me, excepting Carroll, who knows of my old infirmity. I could have stolen largely from friends I have visited, for even my own parents knew nothing of my old temptation. But the desire has left me, and I feel only loathing and contempt for the shallow excuses with which I once quieted my conscience. Carroll may trust me!"
And Carroll did trust her, and has never regretted his confidence. He comes, with his wife and children, to pass the summer months at Locust Grove, and he is not more stern and strict in his teaching to the little ones of the value of honesty than is Agnes, his wife, who once believed herself an incurable case of kleptomania. —Anna M. Lord Howe's Body Found
By LABORERS DIGGING FOR A SEWER AT FORT TICONDEROGA, N. Y.

A recent despatch from Ticonderoga to the Morning Telegram says:—While laborers were engaged in digging a sewer in one of the principal streets of this village to-day they struck a tombstone. At the bottom of it was found a coffin, containing the bones of a human being. The stone was washed off and found to contain the inscription and date of death of Lord Howe. The skull was intact, but the rest of the bones were disjointed and considerably decayed. As soon as it had been learned about the village an immense crowd of people assembled, and many made desperate efforts to procure pieces of the bones. The coffin, which was of oak, was in a fairly good state of preservation, and it was with great difficulty that people were prevented from cutting it to pieces for relics. Several years ago the streets where the remains were found was filled in several feet, which accounts for the depth of the coffin's location. The remains will probably be re-interred at once in the village cemetery.

(Lord Howe, or George Augustus Howe, was born in England, in 1724, and was shot in battle at Ticonderoga, on July 8, 1758. He entered the army at a very early age, soon rose to distinction, and in 1757 was sent to this country in command of the Sixtieth regiment, arriving at Halifax, N. S., in July of that year. He was transferred to the command of the 8th Light Infantry and was promoted to be brigadier general. On July 6, 1758, under Commander-in-Chief James Abercrombie, he landed at the outlet of Lake George. Ordered suddenly upon the French forces two days later at Fort Ticonderoga he fell at the head of his corps in the ensuing skirmish. The General's Court of Massachusetts appropriated $250 for his monument, which was erected in Westminster Abbey.)

Sullivan Dead Broke.
ANOTHER FORTUNE, $20,000, SQUANDERED IN RIOTOUS LIVING.
According to the New York Sun, all Sullivan won in his fight with Kilrain has been thrown away foolishly. He got $3,800 gate receipts and $1000 on his wager with Kilrain. He spent $3600 in getting a release when arrested in New York. When he reached Chicago he had only $575, $500 of which he gave to McAvoy, who lent him $100 before the fight. McAvoy returned $400. Sullivan tucked it into his vest pocket, and was robbed during a drunken stupor of every cent he had by a pickpocket.

The $10,000 won in the fight and $5000 of the original stake were next paid over to him by his backers. He borrowed $1000 more and lived in style at the Vanderbilt Hotel, New York, with 12 companions, paying all the bills, carriage drivers, champagne and all. When he asked for his bill its amount staggered him. He returned to Boston with but $8000, $3000 of which he gave to Annie Livingston.

He is said to owe Clarke, who started him in his boxing business, from $12,000 to $15,000; James Colville and Gleason, $500 each, and T. F. Galvin, the boxer, $500. His income has been enormous, aggregating probably $120,000 during his athletic career. All is gone and his creditors are whistling for their pay.

The acceptance of the $60,000, their share of the money voted by the Jesuits' Estates Act, by the Quebec Protestants is generally regarded as such an acquiescence in the legislation as practically precluding outsiders from further agitation to prevent a minority that declares itself satisfied. The Mail correspondent at Montreal was so impressed by the acceptance of the $60,000 that he went to Dr. Davidson, Q. C., and asked him: "A matter of Estates Act agitation?" The reply was: "The question must be a very general one when even the correspondent of the Mail thinks it necessary to put such a question.—Empire."

A gentleman in London, England, has devised a machine, propelled by mechanism, which, being once set in order for going, will move both machine and rider at a high rate of speed, the force being sufficient to surmount all but the very steepest hills. The inventor calculates enough stored energy may be put into the machine to carry it three or four hundred miles.

An architectural curiosity for which the world may thank Dean Howson is to be found in the corbels of Chester Cathedral, where Mr. Gladstone is represented winking a crowbar and trying to demolish the church, while Lord Beaconsfield is energetically striving to brace up the sacred edifice. The likenesses are exceedingly accurate.
