LORD MORDEN'S DAUGHTER THE TRAGEDY OF THE CEDARS.

CHAPTER XLII

"Then I resign myself to you unconditionally," he said. "I want to give up every penny to Edmund's wife—to Lord Morden's daughter—and when I have their forgiveness, death will be a welcome release." "You must accompany us," the barrister decided, "and I am sure that Peters will be glad to see you. I shall want you to take me to your lawyers, and to-morrow we will go to Edmund's new home, at Richmond, and formally relinquish all that has been misappropriated. That is also other news for you, and that is my firm belief that Lord Morden did not die through your neglect, for Mr. Rogers, and I have proof that he was seen five years later; indeed, he may be alive now!" "Heaven grant that he is!" cried the old man. "Oh! gentlemen, you have taken a load of misery from my guilty soul! I am not a murderer in fact, though in thought. He was seen five years later? You have proof of this? Blessed Heaven, I have not slain the father of my dear son's wife! I can breathe again!" As Norman Locksley's legal adviser, Fairfax took formal possession of the keys, and gave instructions to the butler. Then all Mr. Locksley's personal effects were packed, and ordered to be sent to the barrister's chambers. "I hardly know what I am going to do with the poor old man," he told Rogers; "but I must try and secure for him a small jointure out of his son's income—say five hundred a year, until he dies. I am sure that Mrs. Locksley will agree to this—even if Edmund has willed all to her—which I believe he has." It was late in the afternoon when they reached London, and while Mr. Locksley went with Fairfax to see Peters, Frank Rogers sent the telegram to Richmond which so sorely puzzled Dora. "Why the deuce didn't he leave a note?" exclaimed Fairfax. "By George! I feel half afraid that you are out of your mind, Rogers." "No, sir, it's a glorious truth, every word of it, and he has gone home to Richmond, with Lord Alfred Morden, who was waiting to see me, in answer to my advertisement." Frank ended with a gleeful little chuckle, and the barrister began to regard him with some concern. "No, no!" he said. "This is too much—this is too much. Your mind is unbalanced." "And I am glad of it," laughed Frank. "It is a most delightful experience! Hurrah! All the troubles will end like those in the fairy books!" (To be continued.)

CHAPTER I

But on the following Monday Jack Drullit appeared at the hall, and with a dogged air of independence, which was always assumed when under the roof-tree of Rivershall, announced that the boat was ready for Mr. Clifford and that he, Jack, was waiting. Mr. Clifford came down, and, after thanking old Jack for the inquiries he had made during his illness, accompanied him to the boat. At the bank stood Lillian. "What a beautiful morning for your trip," she said, with the slight flush that always beautified her face when meeting him. "I almost envy you the row; the river looks so smooth and beautiful." "Why don't you come too?" grunted old Jack; "there'll be two of you from the books, then." Lillian laughed and the flush grew into a dark red. Old Jack got into the boat and set his sculls. "Better come, Miss Lillian. You'll be sorry you didn't. Old Jack hadn't to beg and pray like this one time." "Well, well," she said, as if yielding to the old favorite's grumbling, "don't get out of temper, Jack, and I'll come."

YOUTH IN AGE.

VALT MASON

When a man is old and shaken, he will sigh in his distress, "By my hair and teeth forsaken, little books it how I dress. Blooming damsels do not heed me, or my clothes of pink and blue, gorgeous widows do not need me in the business they pursue. Let the youngsters have a plenty of fine rags, inviting stares; no one cares ten hoots or twenty what an old gray duffer wears." So the old boy goes to pieces, dropping from the well-groomed line, wearing pants that have no creases, wearing shoes that need a shine; and his hat is old and shabby; his appearance is so shabby that his wife and aunt are pained. By his garb he advertises he's a has-been, sad to see, with no hope of pulling prizes from this world's great Christmas tree. People say, "He once was clever, with ambitions quite a few, but he's shot his bolt forever, he is finished, he is through." What a contrast is the voter who in age is standing straight, always claiming that his motor still is hitting on all eight. All the sloth of weaklings scorned, he wears trousers nicely creased, he is dolled up every morning like a bridegroom at a feast. Though his teeth are plugged with putty and his eyes are china-wars, he considers old men nutty who are slouchy, who don't care. So the clothing men attire him in the rags that can't be beat, and the people all admire him as he teeters up the street.

The New Baby

They say it's hard to be a first baby. So it may have been years ago; but nowadays there is VIROL—which, added to ordinary cows' milk or packed milk, endows it with all the digestible and life-giving elements necessary to baby's health and growth. Virol contains bone marrow, malt extract, eggs and lemon syrup with the salts of lime and iron. Perfectly balanced, and readily assimilated, the most delicate digestions, Virol is the best and safest food to wean a baby on. Virol builds sturdy limbs, good teeth and a strong constitution.
