CHAPTER VIII.
AN UNEXPECTED ARRIVAL FROM JAMAICA—
THE CONSERVATION OF STEPHEN AND MALCOLM.

Stephen was no less enraged, but he had more command over himself. Of the two he was the most dangerous, and that by reason of the very power of self-restraint which he possessed. A very hell of concentrated passion burned in his breast, but he kept back its surging force, and said in a voice hoarse, yet unbroken—

"If this marriage is an absolute fact—if this boy of whom you speak is really my cousin's child, and lawfully begotten—then of course my claim to Ardgowan is untenable. But, mark you I shall demand the most irrefragable proof—the most indisputable evidence. If there is the least doubt, or the least possibility of raising a doubt, I shall take every possible means to resist the claim. Everything is suspicious—the secrecy, the silence, the concealment—and if the whole is not cleared up, ay, made clear as noon-day, I will not relinquish the contest. You know as well as I the magnitude of the stake, and may understand how inflexible is my determination."

"All right, sir. I accept your challenge, knowing how fully I can satisfy you. We shall proceed now, if you please, to look at the contents of this little box, and after the hint I have given our young friend here, I don't expect any real play will be attempted. In the first place, inspect the seal and see that it is intact."

He held the front of the box towards them, keeping firm hold of it at the same time, and they saw that the judicial colonial seal was unbroken. This, however, seemed a matter of no consequence; it was the documents within which were to decide the question, and the brothers were eager to get at and examine them.

"Oh, yes; I have no doubt the seal is all right, but that proves nothing," said Stephen curtly.

Under the seal was a string, and from the string depended a key, which, when the wax was removed, Nathan inserted in the lock, and turning it the lid flew up with a jerk, revealing a packet of papers within, tied together with red tape.

This packet Nathan took out and laid on the table beside him, the brothers at the opposite side regarding him with keen and silent attention.

"Before I open the first paper," said the manager, "I had better tell the story of Mr. Morrar's courtship and marriage, and it will let you see why he kept it secret. One reason was that he did not wish it to come to his uncle's knowledge, lest he should be displeased and alter the settlement which he knew he had made in his favour."

"How do you know that?" sharply demanded Stephen.

"Because he made me his confidant in everything. Though only his overseer, he treated me as his most intimate friend, and by the time I can do you will see how entirely he trusted me."

"Go on," returned Stephen, with an impatient nod.

"This was not the only reason he had for concealment," resumed Nathan. "There was another and a stronger one. He had a rival—a planter, whose place was at a different part of the island. He was a Spaniard, and so madly was he in love with the lady to whom your cousin was betrothed that he swore if she did not marry him he would kill her. Poor thing, she was an orphan—Felicia Wentworth, she was called—her parents had died suddenly, and she was left friendless. Don Jose loved her, and so did Mr. Morrar. She had no affection for the Spaniard—she feared him too much for that—but to your cousin she was ardently attached, and when the Spaniard came to know this he was furious, and swore that if she married George Morrar he would have his revenge by taking her life, and those who knew Don Jose knew that he would do as he said.

Suddenly, Felicia Wentworth disappeared, and it was given out that she had left the island. Everyone believed this, and so did the Spaniard. But she had done no such thing; she had married George Morrar, and had secretly taken her to a secluded house, two miles from the seashore, and five miles from Kingston. I was assistant in planning the whole thing. I, and a man who had been a servant to the young lady's father, were present at the ceremony. It took place in a little English church in the suburbs of Kingston, and everything was managed with such secrecy that the affair was known only to us, the witnesses; and the young wife, with her attendant, was placed in the secluded house, unseen by any one who suspected the truth. Your cousin visited his wife as frequently as possible, and the fruit of their union was a boy, born a year ago."
